[1] It is contended on behalf of appellant that, aside from services rendered in connection with the collection of delinquent taxes, his ordinary duties as city attorney were limited by the provision that it should be the duty of the attorney to advise the city officers in legal matters pertaining to the business of the city; that for any services beyond mere advice, where such services were rendered with the knowledge and consent of the members of the board of trustees, there arose an implied obligation of the city to pay compensation in addition to the agreed salary. This contention of appellant cannot be sustained as applicable to the case before us, except upon a narrow construction of the statutory duty of the attorney to advise the city officers with respect to the legal matters pertaining to city business. When the city by its ordinance fixed the "salary and compensation" of the city attorney at a specified sum per month, and then further provided that such salary "shall be in full compensation for all services rendered" by the attorney, these provisions must be deemed to be supplementary to the statute and must be considered as having in view, not only mere advice to be given by the attorney to the city officers, but also any other services that might be rendered by the officer in the nature of services by an attorney and for which no extra compensation was definitely and directly agreed to be paid. And when appellant accepted employment by the city at the agreed rate specified in the ordinance, it is reasonable to assume that he had in view these provisions of the ordinance, as well as the statute.

[2] If appellant at the time when these services were rendered intended to claim special compensation therefor, he should have obtained from the city trustees some official action providing for the allowance of such special or extra compensation. Since there is nothing in the record stipulating or otherwise proving even an informal understanding that such compensation was to be paid, we think that upon the facts shown in this record no implied obligation has arisen and that the salary paid was, as stated in section VIII of the ordinance, "in full compensation for all services rendered" by the appellant. "As between a municipality and its officers, the charter defining the duties of the officers and regulating their compensation is to be construed, in case of doubt, to protect the treasury of the city, for claims against the treasury of the city cannot be sustained on doubtful implication." City of Ludlow v. Ritchie (Ky.) 78 S. W. 199. And this is emphatically true where the officer claiming the compensation is the one charged with the duty of advising the city concerning its legal obligations.

The judgment is affirmed.

LINCOLN v. SIBECK. (Civ. 1586.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. March 24, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨933 — PRESUMPTIONS—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL—FILING—GROUNDS.

Where the record contains a purported statement on motion for new trial, and recites that a notice of intention to move for a new trial was served on the adverse party, but does not show that the notice was filed with the clerk, or on what grounds the motion was presented, as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 659, and the trial court passed on the motion on its merits, it will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the notice was duly filed, and that the errors assigned in the statement constituted the grounds of the motion.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨549—NECESSITY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—EXCEPTION CONTAINED IN ORDER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 647, providing that an order made in the absence of a party shall be deemed excepted to, no bill of exceptions is necessary to show an exception taken to such an order, which states that the party was absent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2441-2451; Dec. Dig. ⇨549.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨933 — PRESUMPTIONS—AUTHORITY OF THE JUDGE TO SETTLE STATEMENT.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 16, providing that it shall be presumed that a court or judge acting as such was acting in the lawful exercise of his jurisdiction, it will be presumed that a judge, other than the judge who presided at the trial, who settled the statement on motion for a new trial, was authorized to do so under section 653 and Supreme Court Rule 27 (119 Pac. xiv), providing that if the trial judge dies, is removed, becomes disqualified, is absent from the state, or refuses to settle the statement it may be settled by another, where the record does not show the reason why the trial judge did not settle the statement.

4. PUBLIC LANDS ⇨135—DISPOSAL OF UNITED STATES LANDS—RELINQUISHMENT—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of a contract for the purchase of a relinquishment to government land, where the defense was a denial of plaintiff's right to the land and a denial that defendant or anyone for him had located thereon under the relinquishment, evidence by defendant that plaintiff had filed on 480 acres of land is not admissible, where there was no showing that the filing on the land in question was made after the other filing or was part of the excess over the legal amount.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 351-362; Dec. Dig. ⇨135.]

5. PLEADING ⇨276 — SUPPLEMENTAL ANSWER—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In such an action it was not an abuse of the court's discretion to refuse to permit defendant, at the commencement of the trial, to file a supplemental answer showing that the land covered by the relinquishment was held by a false and fraudulent entry, where there was no sufficient reason shown why the answer was not filed before the case was set for trial.

6. EVIDENCE ⇨163 — BEST EVIDENCE — ENTRIES ON GOVERNMENT LANDS.

Testimony by defendant as to a filing made by plaintiff on government land, unaccompanied by record evidence thereof, is incompetent.

7. PUBLIC LANDS ⇨135—DISPOSAL OF GOVERNMENT LANDS — RELINQUISHMENT — CONTRACT FOR SALE.

Defendant is liable for a breach of contract for the purchase of a relinquishment on government land where plaintiff had filed on the land, executed a relinquishment sufficient in form, and delivered it to defendant, under the terms of an agreement by defendant to sell it for a certain amount or return it to plaintiff, and defendant converted it to his own use by filing it in the government land office, even though he did not file on the land himself or procure another person to file thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. T. Price, Judge.

Action by Grant Lincoln against D. W. Sibeck. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 143 Pac. 789.

James R. Choate, Edgar F. Hughes, and E. O. Leake, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Robt. T. Linney and Ralph W. Schoonover, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] Respondent claims that the appeal from the order denying a new trial should be denied for want of a sufficient record. The transcript contains a document purporting to be a statement on motion for new trial. It is recited therein that within ten days after entry of judgment the defendant "duly served on plaintiff" his notice of intention to move for a new trial. It is not stated anywhere in the record that such notice ever was filed, and it is pointed out that merely serving such a notice on the adverse party is not sufficient. Code Civ. Proc. § 659. It may be observed further that the record does not show on what grounds the motion was presented. It does appear, however, that the court ruled on the motion as upon the merits, and this being so we are obliged to assume (in the absence of anything definitely appearing to the contrary) that the notice of intention was filed, and that the errors assigned in the statement constituted the grounds of the motion as presented. In Cross v. Mayo, 167 Cal. 594, 598, 140 Pac. 283, 285, the Supreme Court said:

"While on an appeal from an order denying a new trial it is necessary that it should in some way be made to appear in the record what the grounds of the motion for a new trial were (Williams v. Hawley, 144 Cal. 100 [77 Pac. 762]), it has several times been substantially held that where there is a statement on motion for a new trial or a bill of exceptions, containing specifications of insufficiency of evidence and assignments of errors of law, the presumption is, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that notice was duly given, and that the specifications and assignments in the statement or bill of exceptions conform to those in the notice and constitute the grounds upon which the court was asked to grant a new trial."

[2] The statement shows that the trial was had before Hon. L. T. Price, presiding as judge of the court, and the judgment was rendered by him. Under the rule of judicial notice (Code Civ. Proc. § 1875) we know that L. T. Price was at that time, and at the time of the purported settlement of the statement on motion for a new trial he was a judge of the superior court of Alpine county. On the 17th day of October, 1913, a copy of defendant's proposed statement on motion for new trial was served on plaintiff's attorneys. On November 6, 1913, Hon. John M. York, a judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, signed at the end of the statement a certificate reading as follows:

"The foregoing statement on motion for new trial is hereby allowed as settled and correct as no appearance is made by attorneys for plaintiff."

The court's order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, as stated in its minutes of December 8, 1913, reads as follows:

"The plaintiff's motion to dismiss the motion for a new trial heretofore submitted on December 1, 1913, is ordered denied on the ground that attorneys for the plaintiff did not appear at the time statement on motion for a new trial was settled. R. T. Linney, Esq., appearing as attorney for the plaintiff and Williams, Goudge & Chandler for defendants. It is ordered that the motion for a new trial be and is hereby denied."

The respondent now contends that the statement on motion for a new trial cannot be considered for the further reason that Judge York had no right to make the order of settlement. His action in so doing is admitted to have been excepted to, since the certificate signed by him shows that the settlement was made in the absence of the attorneys of the plaintiff. Section 647, Code Civ. Proc. A bill of exceptions to show an exception taken is unnecessary where, as here, a statement of the fact which raises the exception is included in the order.

[3] But, the facts which might have justified the exception do not appear. If Judge Price had refused to settle the statement, or if any other condition described in section 653, Code of Civil Procedure, and in rule 27 (119 Pac. xiv) of the Supreme Court, had come into existence which would authorize another judge to act, then it would have been better practice to show such condition by proper recitals in the record, instead of relying upon the "presumption of regularity" attending official acts of courts and their judges. In this instance, however, it seems that the presumption of law is sufficient to support the act of the judge in settling the statement, since there is a possibility that for some reason Judge Price had refused to settle the statement after request duly made. Under section 1963, subdivision 16, Code of Civil Procedure, it is presumed "that a court or judge, acting as such, whether in this state or any other state or country, was acting in the lawful exercise of his jurisdiction."

The demand stated in the complaint is for the sum of $500 claimed as damages for breach of contract. It was alleged that on November 12, 1912, plaintiff delivered to defendant a document whereby he relinquished his right to certain described land; that at the same time the defendant delivered to the plaintiff a writing in which he acknowledged receipt of said relinquishment, "to sell within 10 days for the sum of $500. * * * In case sale is not made within the specified time I agree to return same." It was further alleged that no sale of the relinquishment was made by defendant, and that after expiration of the ten days the plaintiff demanded from defendant the return of the relinquishment or the payment of said sum of $500, which demand was by defendant refused; that the defendant has sold the relinquishment for a sum in excess of $500. By his answer the defendant does not deny any of the foregoing allegations of the complaint, except the allegation that he sold the relinquishment, but "denies that the plaintiff was then or is now or at any time has been the owner of" the relinquishment above mentioned; "denies that the plaintiff was on the 12th day of November, 1912, or is now or at any time has been the owner of any estate, or interest in, or title to the said land last above described"; also denies that by the terms of said contract or otherwise the defendant agreed to pay the sum of $500 to the plaintiff for the relinquishment referred to within ten days from November 12, 1912, or to return said relinquishment to the plaintiff. Defendant further denied that he had sold the relinquishment or received any sum whatever therefor; and alleged that the relinquishment was, on the day when received by him and is now and at all times has been, of no value whatsoever; also alleged "that prior to the commencement of this action the defendant surrendered said last-mentioned relinquishment to the United States government, who was the legal owner and entitled to possession thereof."

Appellant insists that the evidence is insufficient to support the court's finding of fact that the plaintiff was by right of location thereon the owner of the tract of land in the state of Arizona described in the complaint and in said relinquishment, and that as such owner plaintiff had a right to and did execute and deliver to defendant said relinquishment. It is further claimed that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that the filing of a relinquishment in the land office, as this relinquishment was filed by the defendant, is the usual and regular way of filing relinquishments of the kind herein specified for the use and purposes for which relinquishments are made; or the finding that after the filing of said relinquishment the land was filed upon by another person, which could not have been done had defendant returned said relinquishment to plaintiff; or that the value of said relinquishment was the sum of $500, or that plaintiff has been damaged in said sum of $500.

[4] The issue as to plaintiff's ownership by virtue of a location made by him in the government land office was distinctly raised by the answer of defendant, and the evidence thereon is contained in the testimony produced by the defendant. His counsel endeavored to prove that "other land besides this land in question" had been filed on by Mr. Lincoln. He asked leave to prove that the plaintiff "filed on 480 acres of land in Arizona in the year 1912, 160 acres under the Homestead Act, and 320 under the Desert Land Act." The theory of his defense clearly was that, although the plaintiff had filed on this land covered by the relinquishment in question, yet that he was not entitled to the land because he had filed upon an excessive amount. It may be noted that he did not offer to show that the filing on the land in question here was made after the other filings, or that this land was part of the excess over the legal amount. The defendant testified as to the relinquishment which he had received from the plaintiff; that he had delivered it to the land office at Phoenix, Ariz.; that it was filed there and he saw it on the record. He denied that he had made any filing on said land or that any one else had done so in his behalf or at his suggestion.

[5] At the commencement of the trial the defendant asked leave to file a supplemental answer in which he desired to set forth certain facts showing that the land covered by the relinquishment in question was held by a false and fraudulent filing by one Wyatt in the fictitious name of Grant Lincoln. Defendant claims that the court erred in refusing to allow the filing of this supplemental answer, and in refusing to allow defendant to put in evidence showing that plaintiff had filed on more government land than he was allowed to under the federal law.

The record does not show any sufficient reason why the proposed supplemental answer had not been filed before the case was set down for trial, and it cannot be said that the court in any way abused its discretion in refusing to allow such answer at the time when presented. As applied to the issues raised upon the complaint and answer on file herein, the court ruled correctly upon the matters of evidence above mentioned.

[6] Furthermore, no record evidence was offered by the defendant in connection with his proposed testimony concerning filings made by the plaintiff on government land. The objection that the testimony as offered was incompetent was a valid objection which was correctly sustained.

[7] The court's finding that after the filing by defendant of the relinquishment the said land was filed upon by another person is not sustained by the evidence, but that fact is not material to the case. The record herein sufficiently establishes that the plaintiff had filed upon this land; that he executed a relinquishment in form sufficient to release his claim so that the land could be filed upon by some other qualified person; that he delivered the relinquishment to defendant on the terms noted in the written memorandum; that the defendant converted the document to his own use by filing the same in the government land office without permission of the plaintiff. Upon these facts the plaintiff was entitled to judgment for the value of the relinquishment, and the only question remaining is whether or not that value was $500. The evidence as to this value is very slight, but it is uncontradicted and is sufficient to support the finding. In Lehmann v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 22, 25 Pac. 161, 162, where a factor had received property of his principal to be sold at a fixed price, and the factor had converted the property to his own use, the court said that, "under these circumstances, having converted it to his own use, we think the price stipulated in the agreement is some evidence of the value of the property at the time of the conversion."

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for new trial are affirmed.

OSBORN v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF MERCED COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1377.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 25, 1915.)

1. COUNTIES —55—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—ORDINANCES—REFERENDUM PETITION.

A certificate to a petition for a referendum with respect to an ordinance of the board of supervisors certified that the clerk had examined the registration records to determine therefrom if a sufficient number of qualified electors signed the petition, and that he found that qualified electors in excess of 10 per cent. of the vote cast for Governor at the last general election signed such petition, each and all of whom were qualified electors of the county at the time they so signed. Held, that the certificate was sufficient, and not defective because of the failure to recite that the petition was signed by a sufficient number of "registered qualified electors," and that this fact was ascertained by an examination of "the great register of 1914."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 71, 72; Dec. Dig. —55.]

2. COUNTIES —55—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—ORDINANCES—REFERENDUM.

Under Pol. Code, § 4015, authorizing boards of supervisors to divide their respective counties into townships for the purpose of electing justices of the peace and constables, the action of the board in discontinuing a judicial township and re-establishing the boundaries of another so as to include the one abolished was not executive or ministerial, but legislative and subject to referendum, as the statute provides generally for judicial townships, but grants to boards of supervisors the authority to complete the legislation, and the creation and abolition of a judicial township imposes and takes away a form of government, and in either event the whole county is interested.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 71, 72; Dec. Dig. —55.]

3. COUNTIES —55—BOARD OF SUPERVISORS—ORDINANCES—REFERENDUM.

That some of those signing a referendum petition did not give their place of residence by street and number did not render the petition fatally defective, where the petition was sufficiently specific to enable the clerk to find the signers' names in the great register; the requirement as to residence being for the convenience and aid of the clerk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 71, 72; Dec. Dig. —55.]

Original petition by W. H. Osborn, for a writ of mandate directed to the Board of Supervisors of the County of Merced and others. Writ issued.

A. R. Schottky and Henry Brickley, both of Merced, for petitioner. C. H. McCray and F. P. Tuttle, both of Merced, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The application is for a writ of mandate to compel the board of supervisors of Merced county to repeal a certain ordinance enacted by said board, or to submit the same to the voters of said county. Respondents have filed a demurrer and an answer to the petition, although there seems to be no controversy as to the facts. The ordinance in question is set out in the petition, and it is sufficient to say that it provides for discontinuing one of the judicial townships of the county and the re-establishment of the boundaries of another township so as to include the one abolished.

Three points are made by respondents:

"(1) That the protest petition does not conform to the law; (2) that the ordinance in question is not an ordinance subject to referendum; (3) that the protest petition was not properly circulated, signed, attested, and filed under and in compliance with the provisions of section 4058 of the Political Code."

For a discussion of the general principles involved herein it is sufficient to refer to Chase v. Kalber, 153 Pac. 397, and Minges v. The Board of Trustees of the City of Merced et al., 148 Pac. 816, recently decided by this court. The special objections and criticisms of respondents as to the contemplated procedure may receive brief consideration.

[1] The first claim of respondents is that the certificate of the clerk attached to the referendum petition is insufficient by reason of its failure to recite that said petition was signed by a sufficient number of "registered qualified electors," and that the clerk ascertained this fact by an examination of "the great register of 1914." Said certificate, as far as material, is as follows:

"That after said petition was filed as afore-said I, as said clerk, examined the records of registration in said county to determine therefrom if a sufficient number of qualified electors signed said petition, and from said examination I, as said clerk, have found that a number of qualified electors in excess of 10 per cent. of the vote cast for all candidates for the office of Governor at the last general election signed said petition, each and all of whom were qualified electors of said county at the time they so signed."

The foregoing is similar to the certificate considered in the Minges Case, supra, and, for the reasons stated therein, we hold it sufficient.

[2] We think there is no more merit in the contention that the matter involved is not legislative in character. The authority for the action of the board of supervisors is found in section 4015 of the Political Code, as follows:

"The board of supervisors of each county, as public convenience may require, shall divide their respective counties into townships for the purpose of electing justices of the peace and constables; provided, however, that in the establishment of townships that may be hereafter established no incorporated city shall be divided so as to lie partly within one township and partly within another."

We think petitioner's position is correct that by statute the Legislature has provided generally for justices' courts and judicial townships, but has granted to the boards of supervisors the authority to complete the legislation by determining the number and establishing the boundaries of said townships in their respective counties. The abolition or creation of a judicial township in a county would seem to be as distinctly legislative as anything the board of supervisors may be called upon to do in an official capacity. As suggested by petitioner, the creation of a judicial township establishes for and imposes upon the people residing within a certain prescribed territory a form of government consisting of a justice court and an executive officer or constable. The abolition of a township takes away this form of government, and in either act is the whole county interested, since it must bear the expense of the salaries of said officers. The ordinance in question is plainly of a general and permanent nature, its enactment involves judgment and discretion on the part of the board, and in no respect does it partake of the quality of a mere ministerial or executive act. In fact, the ordinary and usual form of legislation by the board of supervisors finds expression in the enactment of an ordinance, and it would certainly be an exceptional case where it could be held that such enactment was not legislative.

[3] The last objection of respondents grows out of the failure of some of the petitioners to give after their signatures the places of their residence by street and number. The requirement as to "residence" is undoubtedly for the convenience and aid of the clerk in finding the names in the great register. While the petition might have been more specific in this respect it was apparently sufficient for the clerk's information, and the objection goes to a mere irregularity that could and did result in no prejudice. The point is really covered by the case of Conn v. City Council, 17 Cal. App. 713, 121 Pac. 718, and Locher v. Walsh, 17 Cal. App. 727, 121 Pac. 712. In the former it is said:

"In this connection it appears that some of the signers of the several recall petitions did not sign their names in full; that is to say, they gave only the initials of their given names. Others failed to comply with the charter requirement that each signer 'shall add to his signature his place of residence, giving the street and number.' Because of this it is urged that the petitions upon their face fail to contain the requisite number of adequate signatures called for by the charter, and that therefore the petitions were wholly insufficient to confer jurisdiction upon either the city clerk or the city council to inaugurate the recall election petitioned for."

After stating that such strictures were quite technical, and that the charter in question should receive a liberal construction with a view of promoting the purpose for which it was enacted, it was declared that said specifications were "intended solely for the purpose of facilitating the work of the clerk in investigating, identifying, and verifying the persons and signatures of the purported signers of the recall petition," and that there was a substantial compliance with the requirement of said charter.

As we view the law and authorities, we think the writ should issue; and it is so ordered.

1. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT ⇨82 — JOINT AGENTS—SHARING COMPENSATION.

Where defendant company contracted with a manufacturer company that it should assist the manufacturer's selling agent in certain territory, agreeing to receive 25 per cent. of the total commissions on business done by itself and such agent, if defendant's individual sales should amount to 25 per cent. or more of such business, and, if its individual sales should amount to less than 25 per cent. of the combined sales, to receive 5 per cent. commission on actual sales made by it, under such agreement defendant and the manufacturer's agent were to operate as joint agents until the expiration of the time limited in the agreement; and, where defendant sold about half of the product disposed of by the joint agency, it was entitled to no commission other than 25 per cent. of the amount earned by the agency.

2. ACCORD AND SATISFACTION ⇨11—ACCEPTANCE OF CHECK MARKED "IN FULL."

Where defendant company, acting as agent for plaintiff, sent a check marked "In full" to close up their account under a certain agreement, stating at the time that it had no personal knowledge regarding the transaction, but relied on its books of account, which seemed correct, the plaintiff not applying the payment as closing the account, but merely giving defendant credit on its books, and, in subsequent monthly statements, disclosing such application of the check, defendant making no objection, and upon further demand from plaintiff for full settlement, stating that it was entitled to take the position that the account was squared, but that it should be pleased to consider the matter further if plaintiff did not agree, later sending off another check, expressly tendering it in full settlement of all accounts, which was returned, the acceptance of the first check did not amount to an accord and satisfaction.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by John L. Duncan against the F. A. Hihn Company. Judgment for defendant, and from such judgment and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Netherton & Johnston, of Santa Cruz, for appellant. Chas. B. Younger, of Santa Cruz, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought to recover the sum of $1,327.56, with legal interest from January 12, 1911, and costs; the plaintiff contending that the amount is due from the defendant, as the assignee of the California Pine Box & Lumber Company, a corporation. The court gave judgment in favor of the defendant, and denied plaintiff's motion for a new trial, from which judgment and order this appeal is taken.

Plaintiff's claim is founded upon a written contract entered into between said California Pine Box & Lumber Company, and defendant by correspondence. The box company was engaged in the business of manufacturing and selling, among other things, fruit boxes. White & De Hart Company had for some time been the agent of the box company in Watsonville territory. In the year 1908 F. A. Hihn Company, desiring to represent the box company in that field, entered into a contract with it, by the terms of which the former was to receive 25 per cent. of the total commissions payable on the business done by White & De Hart Company and itself should its individual sales amount to 25 per cent. or more of such business; and in the event of its sales amounting to less than 25 per cent. of such combined sales, it was to receive 5 per cent. commission on the actual sales it made. The contract was entered into in April, and was to be effective until December 31, 1908. In effect, the contract provides that, if the F. A. Hihn Company should make one-quarter or more of the sales effected by the joint efforts of itself and its coagent in the Watsonville section, the total commission was to be shared in certain proportions; otherwise F. A. Hihn Company was to receive 5 per cent. commission only on the sales made by it.

No doubt, as suggested by the plaintiff, the defendant was anxious to get a footing in the fruit box business in and around Watsonville, and to that end was willing to make concessions in favor of the old and principal agents of the box company; and perhaps too, the defendant did not expect to sell much more than one-quarter of the boxes to be disposed of by the joint agency. However that may be, the fact is it sold nearly half as many; and it now contends, as it did in the trial court, that it is entitled, not to 25 per cent. of the commission due on the combined sales, but to 5 per cent. on all sales made by it. In making returns to the box company it credited itself with commissions on this basis. The suit, which was brought by the assignee of the box company, is to recover the difference between the amounts arrived at by these different methods of calculation.

[1] We think it quite plain under the terms of the contract that White & De Hart Company and the defendants were to operate together as joint agents until the end of the year, and that the defendant was not entitled to any commission other than the 25 per cent. of the amount earned by the joint efforts of the agents specified in the contract, if its sales amounted to more than one-quarter of the joint sales.

[2] The defendant, however, depends principally for an affirmance of the judgment of the trial court upon its claim that the evidence established an accord and satisfaction between the parties. As we have just seen, there was a controversy over the amount due to the box company; and while matters were in this state the defendant, in January, 1911, sent to the box company a check, saying in an accompanying note that it was "in full settlement of the account." The check was cashed by the box company; and the defendant now contends that, the receiver of the check having accepted it, it must be regarded as having done so subject to the condition that it was in full settlement of the account, and that thus an accord and satisfaction is established, citing section 1521 of the Civil Code and Creighton v. Gregory, 142 Cal. 34, 75 Pac. 569.

This would doubtless be true if the statement just made embraced all that was done in relation to this phase of the case, but, unfortunately for the contention of the defendant, it does not. In its note accompanying the check the defendant (which by the way, the record shows was disposed to be very fair throughout the whole controversy) stated that it had no personal knowledge regarding the transaction, but relied on an inspection of its books of account, which seemed correct. The box company itself did not apply the payment as closing the account, but merely gave the defendant credit for it on its books, and its subsequent monthly statements to the defendant disclosed such application of the check—to all of which the defendant made no objection. In December, 1911, the defendant, in answering a rather insistent demand for a settlement of the account, stated, among other things, that the box company having accepted the check referred to with the condition noted in the letter accompanying it entitled the defendant to take the position that the account "was squared." "However," continues the letter, "we shall be pleased to further consider this matter, should you disagree." Three days later the defendant, in another letter to the box company, after again referring to the circumstance that it had no personal knowledge concerning the correctness of the account, but was compelled to depend upon its books, which appeared to be correct, and after also referring to long-standing friendly relations between them, wrote that "in order to dispose of the difference, etc., we hereby inclose a check for $214.16, and tender the same in full settlement and adjustment of all accounts." This check was returned, and the box company assigned its claim to the plaintiff, who immediately commenced this action.

The conduct of the parties themselves, taken as a whole, shows unmistakably, we think, that they did not consider the acceptance of the check of January, 1911, a final settlement of the account.

Defendant relies to sustain its position on the case of Creighton v. Gregory, supra, but there is nothing in the views which we have just expressed that is in conflict with that case. There the defendant gave a check in full payment of a disputed account, and it was signed at plaintiff's request and cashed by him. The court determined that the plaintiff must be held to have known that the defendant signed the check on the supposition that it closed the transaction and ended their dealings under the contract; that plaintiff was estopped to deny the effect of his deliberate act under the circumstances disclosed. Here, as already stated, there was a time during negotiations looking to a settlement of the account, when the defendant, on the authority of the case just cited, could perhaps have successfully regarded the transaction as closed. This, however, was not done; and, as before stated, viewing all that was said and done concerning the adjustment of the account, it cannot be held that the plea of accord and satisfaction is sustained by the evidence.

In passing upon this case we have spoken only of the contract of the year 1908, while the contract of 1909 is also involved; but this is because it is conceded that, if the plaintiff is correct in his construction of the former contract, he is entitled to the judgment demanded, with legal interest from January 12, 1911. We agree with plaintiff, and it follows from what has been said that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

Under Warehouse Receipts Act (St. 1909, p. 438) § 9, providing that a warehouseman is justified in delivering goods in his keeping to a person who is either himself entitled to delivery by the terms of a nonnegotiable receipt issued for the goods or who has written authority from the person so entitled, either indorsed on the receipt or written on another paper, the former distinction between negotiable and nonnegotiable warehouse receipts is recognized, and the delivery and acceptance of an order for goods not capable of actual delivery, signed by the holder of a nonnegotiable warehouse receipt, is a symbolical delivery and acceptance of the goods, though the warehouse receipt was not delivered, and renders the buyer liable for the purchase price.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Harris, Judge.

Action by the Lewis-Simas-Jones Company against C. Kee & Co. and C. Kee. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Johnson & Shaw, of Oakland, and C. W. Slack and Chauncey S. Goodrich, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Fred L. Dreher, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial.

[1] The appeal from the judgment, not having been perfected within 60 days, after notice of entry of judgment, rests upon the judgment roll alone; and, this being admittedly sufficient to support the judgment, it follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

Upon the appeal from the order denying a new trial, the appellants urge that the evidence is not sufficient to support the findings of the court as to the delivery to, and receipt and acceptance by, the defendants of the goods for the purchase price of which this action is brought.

The proofs in this case, upon which the findings of the court are predicated, are substantially these: The plaintiff was on March 18, 1912, the owner of three certain lots of potatoes which were stored in a public warehouse in San Francisco, and were there segregated and set apart in certain stalls and designated with certain identifying numbers and marks, and for which potatoes the warehouseman has issued to the plaintiff nonnegotiable receipts, which were held by it at the time of the following transaction. On said day the defendant C. Kee, who was doing business under the name of C. Kee & Co., came to the salesman of plaintiff with a request for the purchase of potatoes, whereupon he was taken by the latter to the warehouse, and shown the several lots of potatoes of the plaintiff there, of which he made a thorough examination in the presence of the agent of the plaintiff, and the warehouse employes, after which offers and counter offers were made, which resulted in the defendant Kee finally consenting to the price and agreeing to take the entire three lots of potatoes, whereupon three written orders were made out by the salesman of plaintiff, designating each of these three lots of potatoes by number of sacks, number of stall, and other identifying marks, and also stating the prices, which orders were directed to the warehouseman, signed by the name of the plaintiff, with the initials of its salesman, and were then and there delivered to, received and accepted and carried away by, said Kee. The potatoes were charged to the defendants' account with the plaintiff in the usual manner. A day or two thereafter the defendant Kee came back to plaintiff's salesman, and claimed that his partner was not satisfied with the potatoes, and that he did not want them, and he then tried to return the orders, which the salesman refused to receive, telling him that the potatoes had been sold and charged to him, and that the seller could not take them back. The defendant Kee left the receipt upon a weigher's desk in the office of the plaintiff and went away. There was no showing that the defendant ever presented these orders to the warehouseman, or that the latter or any other person had any lien or claim upon the potatoes which would have interfered in any way with their actual and immediate delivery to the defendant Kee upon the presentation of such orders. The defendant Kee having refused to pay for the potatoes, the plaintiff brought this action for their purchase price.

The only legal question presented upon this appeal is the question as to whether the execution and delivery by the plaintiff of the aforesaid written orders for the several lots of potatoes sold to the defendant Kee, and the receipt and acceptance of such orders by him, constituted such a symbolical delivery, receipt, and acceptance of the potatoes in question as would satisfy the statute of frauds.

It is conceded that these several lots of potatoes were all of such size and quantity as to bring them within the rule permitting their symbolical delivery; and it also seems to be conceded by the appellant that had the plaintiff transferred to the appellant its warehouse receipts for this property, and had the defendant received and carried these away with him as he had the written orders, the symbolical delivery, acceptance, and receipt of these potatoes would have been such as to satisfy the statute of frauds. The appellant, however, contends that under the so-called "Warehouse Receipts Act," passed and approved by the Legislature on March 19, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 437), the transfer of the plaintiff's warehouse receipts for these several lots of potatoes was essential to accomplish the delivery, receipt, and acceptance of the property by the defendant in order to satisfy the statute. Prior to the passage of this act, upon which the appellant thus relies, the Supreme Court had decided in a number of cases, commencing quite early in our judicial history, that the execution and delivery of a written order for personal property not susceptible of manual delivery to a buyer, and the receipt and acceptance of such order by him, was sufficient to constitute such a delivery, receipt, and acceptance of the property as to perfect its sale. Ghirardelli v. McDermott, 22 Cal. 539; Goldstone v. Merchants', etc., Co., 123 Cal. 625, 56 Pac. 776. The case last above cited was decided in the year 1899, at which time there was in existence a statute, the forerunner of the present Warehouse Receipts Act, and which had been enacted by the Legislature in the year 1878. Stats. 1877-78, p. 949. The court in its decision called attention to the distinction drawn in that act between negotiable and nonnegotiable warehouse receipts in relation to the passage of title to property susceptible of symbolical delivery, holding that, in cases where the outstanding warehouse receipt for such property was a nonnegotiable receipt, the delivery of such receipt by the seller was not essential; but that his written order upon the warehouseman would suffice, if received and accepted by the purchaser, to pass title to the property. The statute of 1878 seems to have been carried in substance into the Civil Code, and to have formed the basis of sections 1858 to 1858f, adopted in the year 1905, and in which the same distinction between negotiable and nonnegotiable receipts as to the necessity of the delivery of either upon the sale of personal property in storage appears to have been preserved, for section 1858d of the Civil Code, as then enacted, reads as follows:

"If a nonnegotiable receipt is issued for any property, neither the person issuing nor any other person in whose care or control the property comes must deliver any part thereof, except upon the written order of the person to whom the receipt was issued."

[2] The present Warehouse Receipts Act was passed in 1909. A careful reading of this act will show that it was intended to deal chiefly with the relation between warehousemen and their depositors. Section 9 of that act appears to preserve the distinction recognized in the earlier decisions and statutes between negotiable and nonnegotiable warehouse receipts, for it provides that a warehouseman is justified in delivering the goods in his keeping to "a person who is either himself entitled to delivery by the terms of a nonnegotiable receipt issued for the goods, or who has written authority from the person so entitled either indorsed upon the receipt or written upon another paper, or a person" who is "in possession of a negotiable receipt." Stats. 1909, p. 438. Upon the reading of the entire act, we do not find that there is anywhere expressed in it an intention to require a departure from the rule laid down in the earlier cases and remaining unchanged up to the time of its passage, making the written order of a depositor of goods in a warehouse, upon which there has been issued a nonnegotiable receipt, sufficient to pass, by its delivery, receipt, and acceptance, the title and symbolical possession of personal property not capable of manual delivery, so as to satisfy the statute of frauds, and entitled the seller to recover from the buyer its purchase price.

This being our conclusion, it follows that the evidence in the case at bar must be held to have been sufficient to sustain the findings of the court in plaintiff's favor; and hence that the order denying a new trial should also be affirmed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS ⇨2—PRACTICING WITHOUT AUTHORITY—DENTISTS—STATUTE—CONSTRUCTION—"ANY PERSON."

St. 1909, p. 800, amended Act March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 564), regulating the practice of dentistry, section 1, so as to provide that it should be unlawful for any person to practice dentistry without obtaining a license from dental examiners, except that the right of dentists to practice who had lawful right to do so at the time of passage of the act should not be affected, and amended section 14 to provide that before any person could practice dentistry he should obtain a license which should be good until a certain date, when it should expire by limitation, and that an annual license fee should thereafter be paid. Held that, under the rule that in construing statutes the court must reconcile the different provisions to make them consistent and harmonious and to give intelligible effect to each, sections 1 and 14 were not irreconcilably inconsistent, since in the provision of section 14 that before any person can practice dentistry he must obtain a license, "any person" does not mean every person, but any person other than those belonging to the class which, under the proviso of section 1, were exempted from the operation of section 14, those who had lawful right to practice at the time of the passage of the act.

Application by E. R. Victor for writ of habeas corpus. Petitioner remanded to custody, and writ discharged.

R. H. Wilson, of Bakersfield, and Clyde Woodworth, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Ray E. Nimmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Petitioner seeks discharge from the custody of the sheriff of Kern county, by whom he is held in virtue of a warrant issued upon an information filed by the district attorney charging him with practicing dentistry contrary to the provisions of the law enacted for the regulation of such practice.

The act upon which the information is founded is entitled:

"An act to insure the better education of practitioners of dental surgery, and to regulate the practice of dentistry in the state of California, providing penalties for the violation hereof, and to repeal an act now in force relating to the same and known as 'An act to insure the better education of practitioners of dental surgery, and to regulate the practice of dentistry in the state of California," approved March 12, 1885," approved March 23, 1901.

As then adopted, section 1 of this act provided:

"It shall be unlawful for any person to engage in the practice of dentistry in the state of California, unless said person shall have obtained a license from a board of dental examiners, duly authorized and appointed under the provisions of this act to issue licenses; provided, that this act shall not affect the right under the laws of the state of California, of dentists to practice dentistry who have lawful right to practice dentistry at the time of the passage of this act."

Section 14 of the act, in addition to provisions not pertinent to this discussion, required the applicant for license to practice dentistry to pay to the dental board a fee of $15, and that the fees so received should constitute a fund out of which the necessary expenses of the members of the board, together with the expense of prosecuting cases, should be paid. By an act approved April 6, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 800), sections 1 and 14 of the act, among others, were amended. The amendment to section 1 of the act consisted in adding thereto the following words:

"And no dentist shall be exempt from paying an annual license tax, as hereinafter provided."

Section 14 was amended so as to read as follows:

"Before any person can practice dentistry in this state, he shall obtain a license to do so from the board of dental examiners. Each application shall be accompanied by a fee of twenty-five ($25.00) dollars, which shall in no case be refunded. Such license shall be good until the following first day of May when it shall expire by limitation. An annual license fee of two ($2.00) dollars shall thereafter be paid annually by every person practicing dentistry in this state, and it shall be the duty of said board to issue to all regularly licensed dentists upon application and the payment of $2.00, if made before the expiration of the applicant's license, a new license which shall entitle said person to practice dentistry in this state for a period of one year, and which license shall expire upon the following first day of May. Said board shall have no authority to issue an annual license to any person who is not a regularly licensed dentist, and who has not paid said license fee of $2.00 on or before the date when his previous license expired. Every person who was a regularly licensed dentist and who failed to pay said annual license of $2.00 before the expiration of his license, shall be considered as if no license had ever been issued to him, and before he can again practice dentistry in this state, shall make a new application therefor as in the first instance and pay the regular fee of $25.00 therefor, except that he shall not be required to submit to any examination. * * *

By an act approved June 11, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 573), section 14 of the act was further amended. Such amendment, however, is not material to a consideration of the question here involved.

It is conceded, as shown by the information, that prior to the enactment proved April 6, 1909, petitioner had been duly licensed to practice dentistry by the board of dental examiners of the state of California and had, by virtue of his compliance with the laws theretofore in force, the legal right to practice dentistry in said state. It appears, however, that, notwithstanding the amendment to sections 1 and 14 of the act providing for the payment of an annual license fee of $2, petitioner has failed, neglected, and refused to pay the same, and notwithstanding the fact that his license and right to practice ceased on May 1, 1909, he nevertheless, without compliance with the said provisions, has engaged in the practice of dentistry, which act it is claimed constitutes the misdemeanor, with the commission of which he is charged.

[1] The chief, and in fact the only, contention of petitioner which merits extended notice, is what he claims to be the irreconcilable inconsistencies existing between sections 1 and 14 of the act as amended in 1909. Having in mind the rule that "it is the duty of the court, so far as practicable, to reconcile the different provisions so as to make them consistent and harmonious and to give a sensible and intelligible effect to each," we find no difficulty in the interpretation of the provisions. Section 1 of the act of 1901, as a condition of lawfully practicing dentistry, required every one, other than those who under the provisions of the law theretofore in force (act of 1885) were so entitled, to obtain a license so to do from the board of dental examiners. The meaning of the proviso contained in the section is "that all those having, at the time of the passage of the act, the lawful right under the laws of the state to practice dentistry, shall be excepted from the operation" of the act. Ex parte Hornef, 154 Cal. 355, 97 Pac. 891. By the act of 1909 the Legislature, as we have seen, amended section 14 so that as amended it reads, "Before any person can practice dentistry, * * * he shall obtain a license," etc. Petitioner insists that the words "any person," here used, mean "every person." On the contrary, the language must be construed in the sense limited by the proviso contained in section 1, which exempts certain persons from the requirement. Thus considered, it means any person other than those belonging to the class which, under the proviso contained in section 1, were made exempt from the operation of this portion of the law.

[2] Section 14 was further amended by the act of 1909, by providing that the license so issued should expire by limitation on the 1st day of May following the date of its issuance, and further providing that an annual license fee of $2 should be paid annually by every person practicing dentistry in this state. It will be noticed that this requirement applies, as stated, "to every person practicing dentistry in this state." While this language might be deemed broad enough to include those falling within the exempted class described in the proviso contained in section 1, the Legislature has, nevertheless, removed any doubt as to its intention by, at the same time, amending section 1, adding the words, "and no dentist shall be exempt from paying an annual license tax as hereinafter provided" in section 14. Taking the two sections together as amended, it seems absolutely clear to us that the intent of the Legislature was to exempt all persons who, prior to April 6, 1909, were entitled to practice dentistry in this state, from the requirement of making application for license or paying the general license fee; their status being recognized as having become fixed under the former law; that when it made provision for the payment of the annual license fee of $2 it not only in express terms provided that such provision should apply to every person practicing dentistry, but, in order to leave no doubt of its applicability to all dentists, expressly provided that no dentist, without regard to when or how he became entitled under the laws of this state to practice dentistry, should be exempt from paying the annual license tax, which should apply to all alike.

[3] There is no merit in the contention that the act embraces subjects not comprehended in the title thereof. The subject of the act is, as stated, "the better education of practitioners of dental surgery, and to regulate the practice of dentistry." The provision in the act requiring the payment of this annual license fee of $2 is included in the general subject of regulation expressed in the title. The title is a sufficient index to the subject of legislation contained in the body of the act, and hence is not obnoxious to section 24, article 4, of the Constitution. "The subject of an act being to regulate the practice of a given profession, the Legislature may include in the act the means related to the subject for effecting the object sought." State ex rel. Smith v. Board of Dental Examiners, 31 Wash. 492, 72 Pac. 110. See, also, Ex parte Whitley, 144 Cal. 167, 77 Pac. 879, 1 Ann. Cas. 13; Ex parte Horne, supra; County of Los Angeles v. Spencer, 126 Cal. 670, 59 Pac. 202, 77 Am. St. Rep. 217; Ex parte Hallawell, 155 Cal. 112, 99 Pac. 490.

[4] It is also insisted that the provisions of sections 14 and 21½ are in conflict. The latter section makes provision for the revocation of a license where the licensee has been convicted of a public offense, unprofessional conduct, inefficiency, etc. The subjects of the two sections are distinct and separate and in no wise conflict with each other.

[5-7] Petitioner further insists that section 14 is obnoxious to the provisions of section 25, subd. 2, art. 4, of the Constitution, in that it purports to be a special law for the punishment of a misdemeanor; that it violates section 25, subd. 10, of said article, in that it provides for the collection of taxes which are local and special; that it violates section 1, art. 13, of the Constitution, in that it undertakes to levy a tax upon a class of property not taxable under the Constitution; that it violates section 16 of the Bill of Rights, in that it impairs the obligation of contracts. Such contentions are without merit. The constitutionality of the original act has been repeatedly upheld by the Supreme Court of this state, and similar statutes have long stood attacks from every angle in other jurisdictions. In addition to the cases cited, see Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 9 Sup. Ct. 231, 32 L. Ed. 623; State v. McIntosh, 205 Mo. 636, 103 S. W. 1071.

Petitioner is remanded to the custody of the sheriff of Kern county, and the writ discharged.

MACKROTH v. SLADKY. (Civ. 1458.)

1. PLEADING 236—AMENDMENT—DISCRETION OF COURT.

In an action by plaintiff to recover half of commission earned by defendant through negotiating a sale, where the original complaint set up a written agreement to divide commissions, the court's permission to plaintiff to file an amended complaint setting up an oral agreement was not an abuse of discretion, since the two claims could have been set up separately as different causes of action in one complaint, while recovery on the original complaint would bar recovery on the amended complaint, which are the tests when the allowance of an amendment is proper, the obligation of the defendant being the same whether founded upon a written or oral contract; since an agreement between brokers to share commissions need not be in writing.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS 127—AMENDMENT OF PLEADING—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where the complaint originally pleaded a written agreement to divide a commission, and where such complaint was amended to set up an oral agreement barred by the statute of limitations at the time the amended complaint was filed, the action of the court in granting leave to amend was not rendered an abuse of discretion by the fact that the statute had run; since the cause of action stated in the amended complaint, being, in effect, the same as that stated in the original complaint, dated back to the date of original filing, so far as the statute of limitations was concerned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-547; Dec. Dig. 127.]

3. EVIDENCE 177—BEST EVIDENCE—CONTENTS OF LETTER.

Where secondary evidence of the contents of a letter was sought to be introduced, the original being shown to be in Mexico, such evidence was admissible; since a letter beyond the territory of the state is lost, within the meaning of the statute allowing secondary proof of the contents of writings.

4. BROKERS 66—COMMISSIONS—AGREEMENT TO DIVIDE—"PROPERTY."

Where the agreement in suit was to divide equally with the plaintiff commissions which the defendant might receive upon sales of any properties located in Mexico for any person having such properties for sale who might be introduced to the defendant by the plaintiff, a sale of a fishing concession procured by defendant after his introduction by the plaintiff to its owner was within the agreement, although the agreement did not specifically mention the concession; since it was "property" that was placed in the defendant's hands for sale through the intercession of the plaintiff.

Pursuant to the defendant's demand therefor the plaintiff served and filed her bill of particulars, which, as the foundation of her cause of action, declared that:

"On July 20, 1909, * * * defendant made, executed, and delivered to the plaintiff the following: 'July 20, 1909. In the event of my making a sale I will give one-half the commissions received on any of the Mexican properties I obtain through I. R. Mackroth directly or indirectly. [Signed] Charles Sladky.'"

The bill of particulars further stated that, in accordance with the foregoing memorandum of agreement, plaintiff gave to the defendant a letter of introduction to Louis Martinez de Castro, a resident of the state of Sinaloa, Mexico; that some time during the year 1909 the defendant negotiated a sale of certain fishing concessions and business situated in Mexico from said Louis Martinez de Castro to the Pacific Canning & Exploration Company, for which service the defendant received as a commission from de Castro the sum of $2,500, and that defendant was indebted to the plaintiff for one-half of said sum under and by virtue of the memorandum of agreement previously referred to.

The unverified answer of the defendant consisted of a general denial of the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, and upon the issues thus framed the case proceeded to trial on March 20, 1912, but before the trial was concluded the trial court, "pursuant to the stipulation of the parties herein in open court," ordered that all of the testimony theretofore offered and received be stricken out. Apparently the trial of the case was thereupon continued by consent to January 28, 1913, at which time by agreement of counsel the trial court ordered that the case be tried de novo. Some time between the first and second hearing of the case the plaintiff, pursuant to a motion duly noticed and granted, served and filed an amended complaint, which for a cause of action alleged an oral agreement on the part of the defendant, made on or about September 1, 1908, to divide equally with the plaintiff any and all commissions that might thereafter be earned and received by the defendant for making a sale of certain described properties and concessions in the republic of Mexico which had been previously placed with, and through her intercession intrusted to, the defendant; that, relying on the promise of the defendant to divide such commissions, the plaintiff, in addition, placed in his hands for sale a number of different properties in the republic of Mexico which she, the plaintiff, had already been employed to sell; that the plaintiff gave to defendant a letter of introduction to one Louis Martinez de Castro, the owner of many properties in the republic of Mexico, and at the same time wrote, addressed, and mailed to said de Castro a separate letter recommending that the defendant be employed to make a sale of such properties as de Castro might be willing to sell; that the letter of introduction which had been forwarded to de Castro by the defendant brought about a correspondence concerning the sale of certain of de Castro's properties, which resulted in the defendant proceeding personally to Mexico, where he met de Castro and procured from him authority to negotiate a sale of certain fishing concessions; that the defendant thereafter, and upon returning from Mexico, negotiated a sale of said concessions to the Pacific Canning & Exploration Company, for which, as a commission, de Castro paid to the defendant the sum of $2,500 in gold coin of the United States, which the defendant refused to divide with the plaintiff. The answer of the defendant denied in detail every material allegation of the plaintiff's complaint; and upon the issues thus reframed the case was tried anew. Judgment was entered against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,250, from which the defendant has appealed upon a certified record of all of the proceedings had in the lower court.

[1] The ruling of the trial court granting the plaintiff permission to file her amended complaint was not an abuse of discretion, nor did it prejudice the defendant. "Liberality in the allowance of an amendment to a pleading * * * is the rule, rather than the exception; and in cases where such an amendment can be made in furtherance of justice without jeopardizing the rights of an adverse party it should be freely allowed." B. & W. Engineering Co. v. Beam, 23 Cal. App. 164-177, 137 Pac. 624, 629. This, of course, assumes that neither the cause of action nor the issues involved therein will be radically changed by the proposed amendment. In the present case the cause of action relied upon in the plaintiff's original complaint, although stated in the form of an action for moneys had and received, was, as indicated by the plaintiff's bill of particulars, in fact, founded upon an agreement to divide the commissions received by the defendant for the sale of property, which was procured to be placed in his hands through the intercession of plaintiff for the purpose of negotiating a sale. This being so, it is obvious that the original and amended complaint deal primarily and practically with the same subject-matter, and to all intents and purposes seek precisely the same relief. As was said in Born v. Castle, 22 Cal. App. 282, 134 Pac. 347:

"The claim made by the plaintiff, considered either as a cause of action arising upon contract or as one for money had and received, could have been set out separately as different causes of action in one complaint; and this, according to the rule adopted in some jurisdictions, is the test as to whether or not an amendment shall be allowed. * * * Another test suggested by the New York courts to ascertain whether a new cause of action has been introduced by an offered amendment is to learn if 'a recovery on the original complaint would be a bar to a recovery upon the amended complaint.'"

The fact that the proof required to support the cause of action stated in the amended complaint might be different from that offered and received in support of the original complaint would not necessarily tend to show that the amended complaint stated a new and an entirely different cause of action. Born v. Castle, supra. An agreement between broker and broker to share commissions need not be in writing. Therefore the obligation of the defendant would be the same whether founded upon a written or an oral agreement; and clearly, if the complaint in two counts had separately stated two causes of action—one upon a written and the other upon an oral agreement—the failure of the plaintiff's proof to establish the execution of a written agreement would not have precluded proof of the existence of an oral agreement. In our opinion, the situation of the parties under the amendment in question in the present case is, in effect, not any different from what would be the situation of the parties in the supposed case. Although the plaintiff's proofs in the present case fell short of showing a written agreement by the defendant to divide the commissions in controversy, nevertheless it tended to show the existence of an oral agreement to that effect, and in no sense altered the identity or character of the plaintiff's cause of action; and it is the rule that:

"Mistakes in the statement of the subject-matter of the action * * * may be corrected by amendment * * * so long as the identity of the claim remains the same." 2 Abbott's Trial Brief, 1798; Third Street Improvement Co. v. McLelland, 23 Cal. App. 369, 137 Pac. 1089.

The situation in the present case is essentially different from that disclosed in the case of Norton v. Bassett, 158 Cal. 425, 111 Pac. 253, where the Supreme Court intimated that it would have been an abuse of discretion to permit an amendment to a complaint which alleged facts directly contrary to those testified to by the plaintiffs upon the first trial of the case. There the amendment was proffered after a reversal on appeal of a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs; and "the amendment was offered nearly six years after the action was begun, after it had been prosecuted and tried upon an entirely different theory, and after all the evidence touching the possession [of the land in controversy] was before the trial court." Under the circumstances the Supreme Court said that:

"Inasmuch as the trial court was satisfied from the evidence adduced upon the first trial that the plaintiffs were not in possession of the land, and could not prove such fact upon a new trial without gross stultification of the evidence which they had previously given, * * * it was not only no abuse of discretion, but it was the duty of the trial court to refuse to allow amendments which would effectuate only a protraction of the litigation without changing the result."

No such situation confronted the trial court in the present case. In the first place, there is nothing in the plaintiff's testimony as given upon the first and partial hearing of the case which is absolutely irreconcilable with the theory of the amended complaint that the obligation of the defendant arose out of an oral agreement. Moreover, before the conclusion of the plaintiff's case, and before the court below was given an opportunity to determine whether or not the obligation of the defendant was founded upon a written or oral agreement, the trial of the case, upon the stipulation of the parties, was halted, all of the evidence which had been received stricken out, and the trial of the case commenced anew. Surely, under these circumstances, it cannot be fairly said that the defendant was surprised or prejudiced by the allowance of the amendment to the complaint.

[2] The fact that the oral agreement pleaded and relied upon for a cause of action in the amended complaint would have been barred by the statute of limitations at the time when the amended complaint was filed did not preclude the lower court in the exercise of its discretion from granting the plaintiff's motion to amend. As previously pointed out, the amended complaint did not present or in any wise involve a new and an entirely different cause of action from that stated in the original complaint. The present case may be distinguished from the case of Peiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal. 9, 57 Pac. 690, where the objection "to permitting the amended answer to be filed was that it was not an amendment to the old, but the statement of a new, cause of action, and one that was barred by the provisions of section 164 of the Civil Code."

The facts of the present case are entirely dissimilar from the facts of the case of Patterson v. Doe, 130 Cal. 333, 62 Pac. 569. In that case the plaintiff's cause of action was founded upon an understanding or agreement apparently resting in parol, and the defendants by way of answer pleaded the statute of limitations. On the trial the plaintiff was nonsuited upon the ground that, if any agreement had been made between the plaintiff and the defendant, it was not in writing, but by parol, and was therefore barred at the time the action was commenced by the provisions of subdivision 1 of section 339 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Our Supreme Court held in that case that the nonsuit was properly granted, and that the plaintiff's motion to amend the complaint by adding a count on quantum meruit was properly denied, because the plea of the two-year statute of limitations would still be good to the complaint as thus amended. In the case at bar the statute of limitations was not only not pleaded, but could not have been successfully pleaded, to the cause of action stated in the original complaint; and the cause of action stated in the amended complaint, being, in effect, the same as that stated in the original complaint, related back to the date upon which the original complaint was filed, in so far as the plea of the statute of limitations was concerned. White v. Soto, 82 Cal. 654, 25 Pac. 210.

[3] The trial court did not err in its ruling permitting secondary evidence of the contents of the plaintiff's letter introducing the defendant to de Castro. It was established in evidence that this letter was written and addressed by the plaintiff to de Castro in Mexico. De Castro testified that the letter, if it was still in existence, was at the time of the trial among his private papers in Mexico; and "a letter that is beyond the territory of the state is, within the meaning of the statute, 'lost,' so as to allow secondary proof of its contents." Zellerbach v. Allenberg, 99 Cal. 57, 73, 33 Pac. 786, 791.

[4] The trial court in its findings of fact found, among other things:

"That in the fall of the year 1908 the plaintiff and the defendant entered into an oral contract to divide equally with the plaintiff all commissions which defendant might receive upon sales of any properties located within the republic of the United States of Mexico which should be secured by the defendant from any person having such properties for sale, who might be introduced to the defendant by the plaintiff, and with whom the plaintiff might bring defendant into communication or connection."

It is insisted that the evidence does not show that the agreement in suit was intended to cover and control the commissions which the defendant received for negotiating the sale of the fishing concession. This contention is based upon the assumption that the evidence does not show that in the several conversations between the plaintiff and the defendant, which were primarily the basis of the alleged oral agreement, the fishing concessions of de Castro were mentioned in so many words. Conceding this to be so, the fact remains that all that was said and done by the plaintiff and the defendant, coupled with all of the circumstances of the transaction, warranted a finding that the agreement in controversy was intended to cover and control any and all commissions which the defendant might receive for negotiating the sale of any property of de Castro. The fishing concession was property; it was owned by de Castro, and by him placed in the hands of the defendant for sale through the intercession of the plaintiff. Obviously, therefore, the fishing concession, even though not specifically mentioned, at the time of the making of the agreement, by necessary implication, was covered and controlled by the agreement.

GREAT WESTERN POWER CO. v. PILLSBURY et al. (Sac. 2237.)

Rehearing Denied June 10, 1915.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series—PERSONAL INJURY—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—REVIEW—CERTIORARI FROM SUPREME COURT.

In the absence of any special constitutional authorization when Act April 8, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 796), entitled an act to provide for compensation for the accidental injuries to employes, establishing an Industrial Accident Board, etc., and providing that the award or orders of the board may be reviewed by a proceeding in the superior court, and that its determination shall be subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court, was passed, such act was not effective to take away or impair the constitutional jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, so as to prevent application to it to exercise its original jurisdiction by way of certiorari.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series—ACTION FOR INJURY—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CERTIORARI—REVIEW OF FINDINGS.

A finding on conflicting evidence by the Industrial Accident Board, acting under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1911, p. 796), made conclusive and reviewable only on certain grounds, cannot be inquired into on writ of review; since that searches only the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal, and not errors committed within its jurisdiction.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡842—REVIEW—FINDINGS.

The claim that a finding of a court or jury is without support in evidence presents a question of law, rather than of fact.

4. TRIAL ⚡404—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVE-NESS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

Where the jurisdiction of a board depends upon the existence of certain facts, the board has jurisdiction to determine whether or not those facts exist, and its determination that they exist is conclusive on collateral attack.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 957-962; Dec. Dig. ⚡404.]

5. CERTIORARI ⚡64—WRIT OF REVIEW—JURISDICTIONAL FACTS.

"Certiorari" is not a collateral, but a direct, attack, and thereunder the existence of jurisdictional facts may be inquired into, and to this end the evidence itself may in proper cases be brought up for examination.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT ⚡250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—PERSONAL INJURY—REVIEW—JURISDICTION.

Act April 8, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 796), providing for compensation for accidental injuries of employes, and establishing an Industrial Accident Board, provides by section 3 that liability for the compensation fixed therein, without regard to negligence, shall exist against any employer for any personal injury accidentally sustained by an employé, or for his death proximately resulting therefrom, where the injury is not caused by the willful misconduct of the employé, and provides that the board shall file findings of facts and its award, and that its findings while acting within its powers shall be conclusive, and that the award may be set aside only on the grounds that the board acted without power or in excess of its powers, that the award was procured by fraud, or that the findings of fact do not support the award. Act June 16, 1913 (St. 1913, p. 950), vested the powers of the board in the commission created by Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279). Held, on certiorari from the Supreme Court, on application of the employer to review an award, that whether a finding that the accident was caused by the "willful misconduct of the employé" was supported by the evidence so as to sustain the award went to the jurisdiction of the board and was reviewable.

7. MASTER AND SERVANT — 250¾, New, vol. 16 Key-No. Series—WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—PERSONAL INJURY—"WILLFUL MISCONDUCT."

Under Act April 8, 1911 (Stat. 1911, p. 796), providing for compensation for accidental injuries to employés, and establishing an Industrial Accident Board, by section 3 making an employer liable for compensation without regard to negligence for injury or consequent death from accidental injury, unless caused by "the willful misconduct of the employé," a skilled and experienced lineman, killed while working on "hot wires," who disobeyed the employer's known rule against working on such wires without using the rubber gloves provided by it, and which were on hand ready for use, to whom the foreman a few hours before the accident sent up such gloves, was guilty of "willful misconduct," so that an award of the board was not supported by the findings of fact, and would be annulled.

Angellotti, C. J., dissenting in part.

In Bank. Proceeding under the Workmen's Compensation Act (St. 1913, p. 279) by dependents of James Mayfield, employé, to obtain compensation for his death, opposed by Great Western Power Company, employer. Compensation was awarded by the Industrial Accident Commission, and, on application of the employer, certiorari issued from the Supreme Court to review the award. Award annulled.

Guy C. Earl and W. H. Spaulding, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Christopher M. Bradley and Aaron L. Sapiro, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. A writ of certiorari was issued by this court, on the application of Great Western Power Company, to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission fixing upon said applicant a liability for the death of James Mayfield, one of its employés. The injury to Mayfield, and his resulting death, occurred on October 15, 1913. On that date the "Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act" (Stats. 1913, p. 279) had been approved, but it was not yet in force; the final section (92) of the act providing that it should take effect on the 1st day of January, 1914. And the preceding section (91) specifically provides that the "compensation provisions of the act shall not apply to any injury sustained prior to the taking effect thereof." The relative rights of the employing company and of Mayfield's dependents must, therefore, find their definition in the provisions of the law in force at the time of the injury and death, i. e., the act of April 8, 1911, entitled "An act relating to the liability of employers for injuries or death sustained by their employés, providing for compensation for the accidental injury of employés, establishing an industrial accident board," etc. Stats. 1911, p. 796. In the interest of brevity we shall refer to the two acts by titles popularly applied to them, designating the earlier statute, that of 1911, as the "Roseberry Act," and the later, that of 1913, as the "Boynton Act." Mention should also be made of an act approved June 16, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 950). This statute provided that, upon the organization of the Industrial Accident Commission (provided for by the Boynton Act), the powers vested in the Industrial Accident Board (existing under the Roseberry Act) should be performed by said commission.

In this proceeding we are earnestly urged by petitioner to consider and decide a number of constitutional objections to the validity of the Boynton Act. But such inquiry would manifestly be futile and improper if, as appears to be the case, the rights of the parties are fixed, not by the Boynton Act, but by the Roseberry Act. Recognizing the force of this consideration, the petitioner seeks to bring the validity of the Boynton Act into the field of discussion by the claim that the Industrial Accident Commission, which, as successor to the Industrial Accident Board, undertook to act in this case, owes its existence solely to the terms of the Boynton Act, and can have no legal existence if that act be void.

The attack on the validity of the Boynton Act is based entirely on the compensation provisions of that law. The act contains many other provisions. For example, the commission is given power to make regulations regarding safety devices and other methods of protection, to investigate places of employment, to distribute information regarding the causes and prevention of industrial accidents, and to make annual reports to the Governor. The petitioner has not attacked these parts of the act, and it is difficult to imagine any ground upon which the validity of some of them, at least, could be questioned. They are easily separable from the rest of the act, and, without regard to the saving clause contained in section 86, subd. "b," of the act, could be upheld even if the compensation provisions were bad. We have, then, a validly constituted commission, empowered to apply the Roseberry Act to cases arising before January 1, 1914. The present case being one of that class, we have here no further concern with the validity of the compensation provisions of the Boynton Act, and will leave the consideration of the constitutional questions presented in that behalf until their determination is called for, as it will be in several cases now pending in this court.

[1] The Roseberry Act is assailed by the petitioner in one particular only. That act provides that awards or orders of the board may be reviewed by a proceeding (in the nature, apparently, of a writ of certiorari) in the superior court; the determination of that court to be subject to an appeal to the Supreme Court. The only purpose of the contention that this provision is invalid is to support the action of the petitioner in seeking relief from this court in the first instance, without prior resort to the superior court. The writ has been issued by us as an exercise of our original jurisdiction, and the respondents do not question our power to review the award of the commission. Under these circumstances, there appears to be no occasion for extended discussion of the constitutional point. Let us say, in a word, that, in the absence of some special constitutional authorization—and there was none such when the Roseberry Act was passed—the constitutional jurisdiction of this court could not be taken away or impaired by legislative act. Pac. Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 647, 690, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, and cases cited. The Roseberry Act was not, therefore, effective to prevent application to this court to exercise its original jurisdiction by way of certiorari.

We are, then, finally, brought to a consideration of the merits of the case. The Roseberry Act, in providing a system of compensation for accidental injuries to employes, made the application of the system elective, so far as both employers and employes were concerned. The employers who are subject to the liability created by the act are those only who, prior to the accident which gives rise to the claim, "have elected," by written statement filed with the board, and not withdrawn, "to become subject to the provisions of this act." Employes are deemed to have elected to be subject to the act where the employer, at the time of the accident, has so elected, and the employe has not, at one of certain times specified, given notice of his election not to come under the act. In the case at bar both the employer, Great Western Power Company, and the employe, Mayfield, were subject to the provisions of the act. Where liability for compensation exists its amount is fixed according to a schedule set forth in sections 8 and 9 of the act. The conditions determining the liability are stated in section 3, as follows:

"Liability for the compensation hereinafter provided for, in lieu of any other liability whatsoever, shall, without regard to negligence, exist against an employer for any personal injury accidentally sustained by his employes, and for his death if the injury shall approximately cause death, in those cases where the following conditions of compensation concur:

"(1) Where, at the time of the accident, both the employer and employe are subject to the provisions of this act according to the succeeding sections hereof.

"(2) Where, at the time of the accident, the employe is performing service growing out of and incidental to his employment and is acting within the line of his duty or course of * * * employment as such.

"(3) Where the injury is approximately caused by accident, either with or without negligence, and is not * * * caused by the willful misconduct of the employe."

The determination of all disputes and controversies concerning compensation under the act is committed to a board of three members, known as the "Industrial Accident Board." This body has now, as we have said above, been superseded by the "Industrial Accident Commission." After hearing the board is required to file: "(1) Its findings upon all facts involved in the controversy; and (2) its award, which shall state its determination as to the rights of the parties." The "findings of fact made by the board acting within its powers" are declared, in the absence of fraud, to be conclusive, and, under the review authorized by the act, the award may be set aside "only upon the following grounds: (1) That the board acted without or in excess of its powers; (2) that the award was procured by fraud; (3) that the findings of fact by the board do not support the award." We are not here concerned with the second and third grounds thus specified, and may dismiss from consideration the question whether either of these grounds may properly be brought within the scope of a writ of review. The contention of the petitioner is that the board acted without or in excess of its powers, or, in other words, that it exceeded its jurisdiction.

In the hearing before the commission it was conceded that Mayfield was, on the 15th day of October, 1913, an employe of the petitioner, and that, on that day, while performing service incidental to his employment, he met with an accidental injury which caused his death. The controversy turned entirely on whether the injury was caused by Mayfield's willful misconduct. The commission made its findings in general terms; the one bearing on the point just mentioned being that "the death of said James W. Mayfield was proximately caused by accident, and was not so caused by the willful misconduct of such deceased employe." The petitioner contends that this finding is absolutely without support in the evidence before the commission, and that the award based upon it cannot stand.

[2] It is, of course, conceded that, in any case in which there is a conflict of evidence, the finding of the commission cannot be inquired into here. This results, not only from the provision of the act that the board's findings of fact shall be conclusive, but from the nature of the writ of review, which searches only the jurisdiction of the inferior tribunal, not errors which it may have committed within its jurisdiction. But when the board has power to act only upon given facts, and there is no evidence whatever to show the existence of those facts, a finding that they do exist cannot, it is claimed, foreclose inquiry by a court under a writ of certiorari. This position is, indeed, not questioned by the respondents, who concede that, where the evidence is all one way, and the finding is to the contrary, the question becomes one of law, reviewable in a proceeding like the one before us. And, in thus agreeing, the parties are supported by the general current of authority, including the decisions of this court on the general scope of the writ of certiorari, and, as well, a number of rulings of other courts on cases arising under statutes similar to the Roseberry Act.

[3] To begin with, it is thoroughly settled that the claim that a finding of a court or jury is without support in the evidence presents a question of law, rather than of fact. Herbert v. S. P. Co., 121 Cal. 229, 53 Pac. 651. It is only because this issue is one of law that it could be considered on appeal in criminal cases during the period (prior to the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution) when the appellate jurisdiction, in such cases, was limited to "questions of law alone." Const. art. 6, § 4; People v. Smallman, 55 Cal. 185; People v. Kuches, 120 Cal. 566, 52 Pac. 1002.

[4] Where the jurisdiction of a board depends upon the existence of certain facts, the board has jurisdiction to determine whether or not those facts exist (In re Grove Street, 61 Cal. 438), and its determination that they exist is conclusive on collateral attack (Id.; People v. Los Angeles, 133 Cal. 338, 65 Pac. 749).

[5] Certiorari, however, is not a collateral, but a direct attack (Van Fleet, Coll. Att. § 2), and under this writ the existence of the jurisdictional facts may be a subject of inquiry. To this end the evidence itself may, in proper cases, be brought up for examination.

"While the writ of review is not a writ of error, and is not a means by which, as upon appeal, the mere manner of conducting the proceedings, the rulings of the court upon questions of evidence, and other matters within the jurisdiction, involving the merits, however erroneous they may be, can be reviewed, it is nevertheless, a means by which the power of the court in the premises can be inquired into; and for this purpose the review extends, not only to the whole of the record of the court below, but even to the evidence itself, where necessary to determine the jurisdictional fact." Schwarz v. Super. Ct., 111 Cal. 106, 112, 43 Pac. 580, 582; People v. Board, 14 Cal. 479; Lowe v. Alexander, 15 Cal. 301; Blair v. Hamilton, 32 Cal. 49; Stumpf v. Board, 131 Cal. 364, 63 Pac. 663, 82 Am. St. Rep. 350; People v. Goodwin, 5 N. Y. 568.

[6] The provision of the Roseberry Act making findings of fact by the board conclusive should, we think, be taken to include findings of jurisdictional facts as well as others. But a review by a court which shall determine whether the board has acted in excess of its powers is expressly provided for, and it should not be held that a review can be avoided by a mere declaration, unsupported by any evidence, that the jurisdictional facts exist. Such declaration is to be regarded, not as a finding of fact, but as an assumption of jurisdiction, based upon a false or erroneous application of the law.

The question whether the accident was caused by the "willful misconduct of the employé" is one that goes to the jurisdiction of the board, and is therefore open to inquiry on certiorari. Under the terms of the act, the liability exists only where there is a concurrence of certain conditions, one of which is the absence of such willful misconduct. If the injury occurred through the employé's willful misconduct, there is no liability, and no power on the part of the board to assess compensation. This is the view taken by the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in considering like questions arising under the Workmen's Compensation Law of that state. Laws Wis. 1911, c. 50. The Wisconsin statute furnished the model for the Roseberry Act. It contains provisions which are, in substance, identical with the sections of our law defining the conditions of liability, and declaring the conclusive character of the findings of the commission. The Wisconsin court, in Borgnis v. Falk Co., 147 Wis. 327, 360, 133 N. W. 209, 219, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 489, said that:

"The jurisdiction of the Industrial Commission to entertain any claim for compensation under the act rests upon two facts which must exist, viz.: (1) That both employer and employé have elected to come under the act; and (2) that the injury was received in service growing out of or incidental to the employment as the result of accident, and not of willful misconduct. The Industrial Commission must, of course, decide these questions in any case where they are raised; but it cannot decide them conclusively, for they are jurisdictional questions on which its right to act at all depends."

Under statutes of like character, the decisions of other courts are uniformly to the effect that, although findings of fact made by the board or commission are generally binding, they may yet be reviewed, as matter of law, where absolutely unsupported by the evidence. Rakiec v. Del., etc., Co. (N. J. Sup.) 88 Atl. 953; George v. Glasgow Coal Co. (1909) App. Cas. 123; McCaffrey v. G. N. Ry. Co., 36 Ir. L. T. Rep. 27; Fenton v. Thorley & Co. (1903) A. [7] There was no substantial conflict in the testimony before the commission. The Great Western Power Company was engaged in the business of generating electricity and distributing it in the city of Sacramento and elsewhere. On November 18, 1911, it filed its election to accept the provisions of the Roseberry Act. James W. Mayfield entered its employ as a lineman in May, 1913. On the date of the accident both the company and Mayfield were subject to the provisions of the act. Mayfield was about 35 years old in October, 1913. He was a journeyman lineman, skilled and experienced at his trade. On October 15, 1913, Mayfield and one Streepy, a fellow lineman in the employ of the power company, were directed by a foreman to ascend a pole situated on Seventh street, in Sacramento, and to remove two transformers from the top of the pole. The pole was carrying wires transmitting a current of 2,300 volts. Tap wires led from the main lines to the transformers, which were used to reduce the voltage to 220. Streepy pulled the plugs connecting the tap wires to the transformer boxes. Thereupon Mayfield, who was standing on a crossarm, called to Streepy, "All right, Bill, I am going to cut her," and reached up with his pliers to cut one of the tap wires connected with the main line. In so doing he received the shock which caused his death. Streepy saw him sink; his body being held to the pole by a safety belt which he was wearing. By the time he was lowered to the ground life was apparently extinct.

The pole and appliances of the power company had been erected in 1912, and were of standard construction. Near by was a telephone pole, and a guy wire ran from the telephone pole to the ground. It had sagged, and thereby come in contact with a metal brace attached to the crossarm of the power pole, but Streepy did not observe this, nor, probably, did Mayfield. It was suggested, in the evidence, that the shock to Mayfield had occurred through a "grounding" of the current through this guy wire. There is no danger in touching a high-power wire unless a "ground" is produced; that is to say, unless a circuit is made through the body of the person touching the wire. This "grounding" may occur through the pole itself, if there be moisture in the pole, or in various other ways. Streepy testified that a man may safely cut a high-power wire (or "hot" wire, as it is called) at certain times and places, "unless he comes in contact with a ground or other hot wire," but that a man is never sure whether he is going to get a ground. The great hazard attending this kind of work (on "hot" wires) may be obviated by the wearing of rubber gloves, which afford a perfect protection to the wearer. Mayfield, it is perhaps unnecessary to say, was not wearing such gloves at the time of the accident. In August, 1912, the company had issued to its division superintendents orders¹ that employes should not work on poles or towers carrying live wires without the use of a safety belt, nor "work on live wires of 500 volts to 5,000 volts, inclusive, without the use of rubber gloves provided by the company." Violations of these rules were declared to be sufficient cause for dismissal, and the division superintendents were directed to give suitable instructions to members of their divisions. Copies of the rules were posted at Sacramento in places where foremen and linemen reported. The foremen were directed to explain these rules to their linemen and to see to their enforcement. The gloves were supplied by the company, and were on hand ready for use. That Mayfield knew of the rules from the time he entered the company's employ is not open to serious question. Nor can it be doubted that he, an experienced lineman, was fully aware of the hazards involved in work on "hot" wires. But, beyond all this, Mayfield had, three days before the fatal accident, and again only an hour and a half before his death, been required by his foreman to wear the rubber gloves. On the latter occasion Mayfield had ascended a pole without his gloves, and the foreman, Cleek, directed his attention to the matter, and had the gloves sent up to him. When Mayfield and Streepy came to the pole on which the accident occurred, they were accompanied by a wagon in charge of a helper. In this wagon were their tools and their rubber gloves. They ascended the pole without taking their gloves.

The failure to use these gloves in working on the hot wires was claimed by the power company to constitute willful misconduct on the part of Mayfield. A majority of the commission decided against this claim. Commissioner Weinstock dissented, filing an opinion which, we think, states clearly and convincingly the reasons why a different result should have been reached. From that opinion we quote:

"The employer had issued and posted rules expressly enjoining the use of rubber gloves by linemen when working with 'hot' wires, and had furnished such rubber gloves as a part of the equipment of linemen. The foremen were familiar with the rule. The foreman in immediate charge of the work in which the deceased lost his life was familiar with the rule. He had instructed the use of the gloves on this sort of work not more than two hours before the deceased lost his life by reason of not using them. It was the duty of the foreman to give this order. It was the duty of the deceased to obey it. It was a deliberate breach of his duty to disobey it. The rule was made and the equipment was supplied to safeguard workmen against unforeseen and hidden dangers such as caused the death of the employe here. Other precautions could be taken, and, under the evidence, would be taken, against obvious dangers.

"The deceased was a lineman of seasoned experience. The risks of his employment were known to him. He was not only recently advised of, but was perfectly familiar with, the necessity of taking the prescribed precaution by using the gloves in the work in which he lost his life. To my mind his misconduct manifested a wanton indifference and a willful disregard of all caution and precaution."

There is little to add to these expressions, based, as they are, upon evidence which is undisputed. The term "willful misconduct" is found in earlier statutes on the same subject. In some of the enactments, as in England, the phrase used is "serious and willful misconduct." Willful misconduct means something more than negligence. It does not include every violation or disregard of a rule. Casey v. Humphries, [1913] 6 B. W. C. C. 520. But it cannot be doubted that a workman who violates a reasonable rule made for his own protection from serious bodily injury or death is guilty of misconduct, and that, where the workman deliberately violates the rule, with knowledge of its existence and of the dangers accompanying its violation, he is guilty of willful misconduct. Brooker v. Warner, 23 L. T. R. 201. We shall not undertake to review the numerous cases cited by the respective parties. Each turns upon its own peculiar facts, and little would be gained by a recital of circumstances under which it may have been held that willful misconduct was, or was not, shown as matter of law. In this case we are satisfied that there was no substantial evidence which, by itself, or with the aid of fair inference, supports the finding of the commission. The grave character of Mayfield's act in violating the rule is apparent from the nature of the consequences which would be likely to follow, and in this case did follow, its violation. That Mayfield intentionally violated the rule is the only conclusion that can reasonably be drawn from the evidence. He knew the rule, he had very recently been reminded of it, he knew the danger of cutting "hot" wires without rubber gloves, and he knew (and announced) that he was about to cut the wires. The only rational interpretation of the evidence is that he preferred to work without the gloves because (as appears in the testimony) their use is somewhat inconvenient. But he did this with full appreciation of what it involved.

There is no foundation in the evidence for the suggestion that the company had virtually abrogated the rule by failing to enforce it. It is true that no lineman was discharged for failing to wear gloves, but the testimony already outlined shows that the foremen insisted upon compliance when they observed that the rule was disregarded. The fact that the telephone guy wire came in contact with the pole is of no consequence. The very purpose of the rule was to protect against unforeseen dangers arising from unobserved or unobservable contacts and connections. The use of rubber gloves on hot wire work was required, even though no danger was apparent. What Mayfield did was to take the chance of violating the rule. The chance having turned out unfavorably, it cannot be said that he was not guilty of willful misconduct because, under different conditions, he might have escaped injury.

The award under review is annulled.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

MELVIN, J. I concur, and I agree in everything in the above opinion the more readily because I believe that it is in perfect harmony with the opinion written by me (but not adopted in its entirety by the majority of this court) in Del Mar Water, Light & Power Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 669, 140 Pac. 591, 948. I endeavored in that opinion to express a belief that the findings of the Railroad Commission upon the facts underlying its own jurisdiction are subject to review when there is no real conflict of evidence; yet the majority of the court held that we might not question the finding (without which admittedly the commission could not act) that the petitioner was a public utility, based merely upon evidence which, as I endeavored to show, was in no real conflict with the uncontradicted fact that the Del Mar Company was only the incorporated agent of a land company for managing its water department. In the present case that same measure is applied to the findings of the Industrial Accident Commission. I believe that there was no real conflict of evidence in the Del Mar Case, and that there is none in this. In the case at bar I believe that an excess of jurisdiction by the commission was shown, just as I was convinced that the Railroad Commission exceeded its jurisdiction in the Del Mar proceeding.

ANGELOTTI, C. J. I concur in the views expressed in the opinion of Mr. Justice SLOSS, except that portion thereof holding that the conclusion of the Industrial Accident Commission that the death of the employé, Mayfield, was not caused by his own "willful misconduct" is without sufficient legal support in the record. It is admitted that the term "willful misconduct" means something different from and more than negligence, however gross. The term "serious and willful misconduct" has been described by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts in Re Burns, 218 Mass. 8, 105 N. E. 601, as being something "much more than mere negligence, or even gross or culpable negligence," and as involving "conduct of a quasi criminal nature, the intentional doing of something either with the knowledge that it is likely to result in serious injury, or with a wanton and reckless disregard of its probable consequences." It may be true that the evidence in this case was of such a nature as to show that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence, and it may also be true that a finding by the Industrial Commission that he was guilty of willful misconduct would have had sufficient legal support in the evidence. But I do not think that the evidence was such as to warrant us in holding that there was not sufficient support therein for the contrary finding that was in fact made; in other words, I do not think that we should hold that such evidence compels the conclusion, as matter of law, that the death of deceased was caused by his own "willful misconduct." I therefore dissent from the judgment annulling the award made by the Industrial Commission.

SPALDING CO. v. ROBERTS, State Treasurer. (Sac. 2148.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING — 310 — TRUST COMPANIES — REGULATION — DEPOSIT OF BONDS AS SECURITY.

St. 1891, p. 490, § 1, provides that corporations authorized to act as executor, trustee, etc., may be appointed to so act. Sections 2, 3, and 4 authorized the courts to require trust moneys to be deposited with such corporations. Section 7, as amended by St. 1897, p. 424, provides that such a corporation, before accepting any such appointment or trust, shall deposit bonds with the state treasurer for the benefit of its creditors. Section 11 provides that such a corporation cannot accept any trust or deposit without procuring a certificate of authority from the bank commissioners. Section 19 provides that, when it desires to cease doing such business, it shall obtain a discharge of all its obligations, and that thereupon its certificate of authority may be revoked and the bonds returned. These provisions were substantially re-enacted as part of the Bank Act (St. 1909, p. 87). Plaintiff's articles of incorporation authorized it to act as trustee, etc., to do a general commercial bank and trust business. One of its two principal stockholders conveyed property to it in trust, and it was administering such trust, but had not accepted any other trust or carried on the business of receiving deposits and did not intend to do so. Its certificate of authority to do business was unrevoked, and it did not intend to proceed under section 19. Held that, even disregarding the trust which it was administering, it was not entitled to the return of the bonds deposited by it, as it was empowered to do the business to secure which the bonds were deposited, and the law intended that the bonds should remain on deposit until all trusts secured were determined and all deposits paid, and the corporation's powers to take other trusts or deposits were extinguished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 1215; Dec. Dig. 310.]

2. BANKS AND BANKING — 310 — TRUST COMPANIES — REGULATION — DEPOSIT OF BONDS AS SECURITY.

Assuming that the Bank Act is unconstitutional in so far as it attempts to regulate the business of accepting trusts and acting in a fiduciary capacity under the orders of a court, this did not entitle plaintiff to the return of the bonds; it still being liable for the administration of the trust created by the stockholder and accepted by it prior to the date when the Bank Act took effect.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the Spalding Company against E. D. Roberts, State Treasurer. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., E. B. Power, Asst. Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant. Chase, Overton & Lyman, of Los Angeles, and George & Hinsdale, of Sacramento, for respondent.

SHAW, J. From the judgment and from the order denying a new trial, the defendant appeals.

The object of the action is to procure a judgment directing the state treasurer to return to the plaintiff certain bonds amounting to $100,105, face value, theretofore deposited with him by the plaintiff to comply with the provisions of the act of April 6, 1891.

[1] The plaintiff corporation was organized on March 9, 1908. Its articles of incorporation empowered it to "buy, sell, manage, control, and dispose of" almost every kind of property and, specifically, among other things:

"(4) To act as trustee, guardian, executor, administrator, assignee, receiver, and in any fiduciary capacity;" and "(5) to do a general commercial bank and trust business, and to accept and execute trusts of all kinds."

Its capital stock is $250,000, divided into 2,500 shares, all of which, except two, were subscribed by Z. S. Spalding and Rufus P. Spalding, and which, so far as appears, are still held by them.

The act of 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 490) provided that any corporation which was authorized by its articles to act as executor, administrator, guardian of estates, assignee, receiver, depository, or trustee, and having a paid-up capital stock of $250,000, may be appointed to act in any of said specified capacities, in like manner as individuals (section 1). It also provided that the courts could by order require that trust moneys, held by any officer or trustee under its jurisdiction, be deposited with such corporation (sections 2, 3, 4), and that such corporations should not be required to give any special bond to secure the performance of such trusts (section 5), but that "each corporation, before accepting any such appointment or trust, shall deposit with the treasurer of state, for the benefit of the creditors of said corporation," $100,000 in bonds of specified descriptions, or real estate mortgages, such bonds and mortgages "to be subject to sale and transfer, and to the disposal of the proceeds by said treasurer, only on the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, and as hereinafter provided." Section 7, as amended in 1897, (Stats. 1897, p. 424). The phrase "and as hereinafter provided" seems to have no application, for the statute does not provide a special proceeding in court to determine as to the sale, transfer, or disposal of the bonds or proceeds thereof. Section 11 provided that such corporation could not accept any trust or deposit, without first procuring from the bank commissioners a certificate of authority to do so. On April 17, 1908, the plaintiff, in order to comply with such statute, deposited with the state treasurer the bonds in controversy, and thereupon the bank commissioners issued to said corporation the certificate as provided in the act, authorizing it to accept trusts and receive deposits of trust funds. This certificate has not been revoked, canceled, or set aside. Immediately thereafter, under the authority thus given to it, the plaintiff accepted from Z. S. Spalding a deed bearing date March 5, 1909, and in November, 1909, upon the same authority, it accepted another deed from said Spalding, bearing date October 5, 1909. These deeds conveyed to the plaintiff a large amount of real and personal property of great value, to be held by plaintiff upon certain trusts therein elaborately set forth. It ever since has been and is now executing and administering said trusts and intends to continue to do so. It has not accepted or received, and does not hold, any other property in trust, nor has it ever sought to do so, or to act in any other fiduciary capacity than as stated. It has never actually carried on the banking business or the business of receiving deposits. It has not endeavored to do so and does not intend to do so, nor to do any business other than that of administering the said Spalding trusts.

By the Bank Act (Stats. 1909, p. 87), which took effect July 1, 1909, the provisions of the act of 1891 were substantially re-enacted as article 4, §§ 90-106, of the Banking Act. It also created the office of superintendent of banks and invested him with the powers and duties formerly exercised by the bank commissioners under the act of 1891. It repeals all acts in conflict with its provisions. It provides that the powers and duties imposed upon any corporation existing and doing business, and embraced within the provisions of the act, are enlarged or modified, as may be required, to conform to the provisions of the act, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in their respective articles of incorporation. Section 145. It places corporations of the character of the plaintiff under the supervision of the superintendent of banks. In January, 1911, the superintendent of banks, upon examining into the affairs of the plaintiff, informed the plaintiff that its business was not within the scope of his powers or duties, and thereupon said officer refused to exercise jurisdiction over it and still refuses so to do. Upon such refusal, the plaintiff, conceiving that it was no longer a trust company doing business under the act of 1891, or the Bank Act of 1909, demanded of the state treasurer the return of said bonds, which being refused, it began this action.

The theory of the plaintiff is that, as it has accepted and is administering no trusts other than the said Spalding trusts and has not sought and is not seeking any other trusts and does not intend to do so, and has not engaged in the banking business or received deposits of money, it becomes ipso facto a private corporation, not subject to the Bank Act, nor to the act of 1891, nor to the supervision of the superintendent of banks, and therefore that it is entitled to withdraw said bonds into its own custody and control, on demand. This also appears to be the theory of the superintendent of banks, and upon this theory the court below made its judgment directing the return of the bonds.

We cannot agree with this theory of the case. The plaintiff, by incorporating as above stated, brought itself within the scope of the act of 1891 and the subsequently enacted Bank Act. In this manner it became empowered to carry on the business of acting as trustee in any of the capacities mentioned in the act, including, among others, that of a depository of moneys. It is, in character, a quasi public corporation, subject to regulation by the state. It ever since has been, and now is, empowered to accept such trusts and to receive moneys on deposit. It has done nothing to divest itself of any of its powers. It has not changed its articles of incorporation by eliminating the powers to do business as a bank, trust company, or depository of moneys. Section 19 of the act of 1891, and section 102 of the Bank Act, provide that any such corporation which desires to cease doing such business shall first obtain a release and discharge of all of its obligations and trusts, and thereupon its certificate of authority may be revoked, and in that event the bonds so deposited shall be returned to the corporation by the secretary of state. The plaintiff has not complied with this provision, and it has not proposed to do so. It desires to continue in the administration of the Spalding trusts. Therefore, if we assume that the Spalding trusts may be disregarded upon the theory that the creator and beneficiaries thereof are consenting to the withdrawal of the bonds, which, however, does not appear, the plaintiff would be precisely in the situation in which it was immediately after it had deposited the bonds and received its certificate of authority from the bank commissioners. It is now, as it was then, fully empowered to do the business for the security of which the bonds were deposited, although, upon the theory stated, it has not yet begun such business. It may, however, engage therein at any moment. The bonds deposited were required as a condition precedent to the grant of authority to receive deposits and accept trusts, not to secure past deposits or trusts, but to secure those contemplated in the future so long as the plaintiff continues to be lawfully authorized to receive or accept them. The law intends that the bonds shall remain on deposit until the trusts which they secure are lawfully determined and the deposits paid, and thereafter until the plaintiff's powers to take other trusts or deposits are relinquished and extinguished. Its intention not to do future business of that character is not sufficient, for its intention may be changed. Its powers must cease before the treasurer would be required to return the bonds.

[2] The plaintiff contends that the Bank Act is unconstitutional, in so far as it attempts to regulate the business of accepting trusts and acting in a fiduciary capacity under the orders of a court. We deem it unnecessary to determine this question. Assuming, for the purposes of this decision only, that the bank act is inoperative for that reason and to that extent, the plaintiff would still be liable for the administration of the Spalding trusts accepted by it prior to July 1, 1909, when the Bank Act took effect. The bonds having been deposited as security, and the trusts having been accepted, in contemplation of the law, on the faith of such security, the bonds must remain on deposit as the law requires until the liability which they secure has in some manner become released or terminated.

For these reasons we conclude that the court below erred in its conclusion that the bonds should be returned to plaintiff and in giving judgment accordingly.

The judgment and order are reversed.

In re AMBROSE. (Sac. 2236.)

1. MARRIAGE —19—VALIDITY—NECESSITY OF CONSENT OF PARENTS OR GUARDIAN.

Under Civ. Code, § 56, the marriage of a female minor over the age of 15 years, to which she consented, and which was duly solemnized was valid, though not consented to by her guardian or parents, and such marriage with the consent of her guardian pending an appeal from the order appointing him was valid, even though he had no authority to give such consent, as it is only when a marriage is contracted by a minor under the age of consent that the consent of the parents or guardian is essential to its validity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Marriage, Cent. Dig. §§ 10, 11; Dec. Dig. —19.]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR —781—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—LACK OF ACTUAL CONTROVERSY.

Under Civ. Code, § 204, providing that the authority of a parent ceases upon the marriage of the child, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1760a, providing that the power of a guardian over the person of the ward is superseded by the ward's marriage, where, pending an appeal by the parents of a minor from an order appointing a guardian of her person, she contracted a valid marriage, the appeal will be dismissed as to her marriage, as involving only a moot controversy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 63-80, 3122; Dec. Dig. —781.]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR —781—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—LACK OF ACTUAL CONTROVERSY.

That the order appointing the guardian appointed him as guardian of both the person and estate of the minor did not prevent the dismissal of the appeal, where, in fact, she had no estate, there was no question of guardianship of her estate involved, and the order appointing a guardian of her estate was obviously an inadventence.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. M. Alberg, Judge.

In the matter of the guardianship of Angelina Ambrose, a minor. From an order appointing a guardian, the minor's parents appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Martin I. Welsh and C. E. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for appellants. Guy R. Kennedy, of Chico, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order appointing a guardian of the person and estate of said minor.

The petition for letters of guardianship was filed by C. S. Cline, respondent, and probation officer of the county of Butte. The minor, who was of the age of 14 years, filed also her request consenting to his appointment. The appointment of the petitioner as guardian of the person of the minor was sought for the avowed purpose, as stated in the petition, that the guardian might give his consent to the marriage of said minor with one Joseph Freitas, who, under promise to marry the minor when she attained the age of consent, had been sexually intimate with her, as a result of which she was expected soon to become a mother. The parents of the minor opposed the appointment of a guardian. On the hearing in the court below it appeared that Freitas and the father of the girl were engaged together in the dairy business, and that while living on the ranch with her family the relations between himself and the girl commenced. When her condition of pregnancy was well advanced, Freitas confessed to the parents his relations with their daughter and her condition, and asked their consent to her marriage with him. This was refused, and, naturally angered and incensed at the conduct of Freitas towards his daughter, the father immediately filed a complaint before a justice of the peace charging him with the crime of rape. Apart from his conduct with the girl, which was most reprehensible, and which undoubtedly, on account of her being under the age of 16 years, subjected him to prosecution for the crime of rape, Freitas was shown on the hearing to be a man of good character and reputation, honest and industrious, and possessed of some considerable means, and both he and the girl expressed an affection for each other and a desire to be married. The parents of the girl were strongly opposed to her marriage, entertaining and declaring against Freitas a natural and justifiable aversion on account of his conduct towards their daughter. It appeared without question that the parents entertained a deep affection and love for their daughter, were perfectly competent financially and otherwise to take care of her and her child in her misfortune, and desired to retain their paternal custody and control over her for the purpose of doing so, and preferring that an illegitimate child be born to their daughter rather than that she should marry Freitas. Notwithstanding this opposition of the parents, the court was of the opinion that, under all the circumstances disclosed by the evidence, it would be for the best interest of the minor in respect to her temporal, mental, and moral welfare that the said C. S. Cline be appointed her guardian, and accordingly so ordered. The order of the court, of course, said nothing with respect to the guardian consenting to the marriage of his ward, although the obvious purpose of having him appointed guardian was that he might do so. From this order the parents appeal, insisting that there was no evidence whatever in the case to authorize the court in depriving them of their natural rights as parents to the control and custody of their child; nothing to show that they were unfitted or unqualified to exercise such rights; and that hence the order depriving them of such control and custody was unwarranted.

[1] We have made only this brief statement of the matters presented in the record on this appeal, because, in the light of events that have happened since the appeal was taken and called to our attention on the day of its hearing before us, it clearly appears that no practical purpose can be attained by a disposition of the appeal upon its merits. On that day there was presented and filed in this court a certificate of marriage showing that after the appointment and qualification of the guardian of the minor, and after this appeal had been taken, such guardian had filed with the county clerk of Butte county his consent as guardian to the marriage of his ward with Freitas; that a license was accordingly issued; and that they were married. Whether the guardian, pending this appeal, could give consent to the marriage of his ward or not, is immaterial for consideration, though it is claimed by respondent that, under section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the validity of his action in that respect cannot be questioned. As the minor was over the age of 15 years, she was capable of consenting to and consummating marriage (Civ. Code, § 56), and, having consented thereto, and her marriage having been duly solemnized, it was valid whether it was consented to by her guardian or parents or not. It is only when marriage is contracted by a minor who is incapable of consenting to marriage by reason of being under the age of consent, as provided in section 56, supra, that the consent of parents or guardian is essential to its validity, and which renders a marriage solemnized without it subject to annulment by the incapacitated minor or at the instance of the parents or guardian of the minor if an action for that purpose is brought within a certain time. Here, however, as the minor was of the age of consent, and her marriage solemnized, it was a valid marriage without the consent of parents or guardian, and, even if the order here appealed from were reversed, it would still remain valid and invulnerable to any attack which she or her parents might seek to make against it on account of the fact that the consent of the latter had not been obtained.

[2] The minor having therefore contracted a valid marriage pending this appeal, it is quite obvious from the legal results which follow from her present marital status that the question between the parties to this controversy as to who is entitled to the care and custody of her person has become of no practical consequence, and that that matter has been eliminated from the domain of controversy in any court. Through her marriage the parental authority of her parents or their right to her control and custody as their minor child ceased. Civ. Code, § 204. Likewise the power of the guardian respondent over her was superseded by her marriage. Code Civ. Proc. § 1760a. Her marriage emancipated her from all parental control which might otherwise be exercised by reason of her minority, and placed her equally beyond further control of the court over her person in any guardianship proceeding based upon such minority. Under these circumstances the solution of the question whether the superior court acted correctly or not in appointing a guardian would be now of no practical advantage or benefit to either party. The controversy over that matter, which is the only point involved in this appeal, practically ended with the marriage of the minor. This being the situation, this court is not called upon to pass judgment on a question which, when given, can have no practical effect, where a controversy existing at the time the appeal was taken has by reason of matters subsequently transpiring ceased to exist. When this appears, the proper course is to dismiss the appeal, and, as it appears so here, that is the order to be entered.

[3] We are not unmindful of the fact that the order appealed from not only appointed the respondent guardian of the person of the minor but also of her estate, but we do not think this should affect the disposition we think proper to make of this matter. It was obviously an oversight on the part of the court in having its order embrace also the guardianship of the estate of the minor. There was no question of guardianship of her estate involved in the proceeding. As we have said, the petition in its direct recitals shows that the guardianship of the person was all that was sought. It was alleged in the petition specifically that the minor had no estate, and the court expressly found in the order of appointment the truth of this allegation, and that the minor had no estate whatever. The order appointing the respondent guardian of the estate was obviously an inadvertence.

For the reasons given, we are of the opinion that this appeal should be dismissed; and it is so ordered.

MILES v. BALEY et al. (S. F. 6440.)

1. PLEADING — COMPLAINT — CONCLUSIONS OF PLAINTIFF.

An averment in a complaint that defendants freely and voluntarily made and entered into a bond is a mere conclusion of the pleader, and affords no assistance in determining whether the instrument was a common-law or statutory bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 12-28½, 68; Dec. Dig. § 8.]

2. EVIDENCE — PRESUMPTIONS — OFFICIAL DUTY.

There is a presumption that a board of school trustees, being public officers, performed their official duty and required contractors to give the bond provided for by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. § 83.]

3. BONDS — CONSTRUCTION — STATUTORY BOND.

A bond, though not in the words of the statute requiring it to be given, is a statutory bond if in substance and legal effect it is the same as the form prescribed by statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bonds, Cent. Dig. § 53; Dec. Dig. § 50.]

4. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS — PUBLIC SCHOOLS — CONTRACTORS' BONDS — CONSTRUCTION.

Where the conditions of a bond given by school contractors followed the language of St. 1897, p. 201, § 1, requiring the giving of bonds conditioned upon the contractors' paying all laborers and materialmen, the instrument will be construed as a statutory bond, particularly as it especially referred to the building contract, though it made no reference to the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Schools and School Districts, Cent. Dig. §§ 195, 196, 340; Dec. Dig. § 81.]

5. SCHOOLS AND SCHOOL DISTRICTS — PUBLIC SCHOOLS — CONTRACTS — RIGHTS OF LABORERS AND MATERIALMEN.

Under St. 1897, p. 202, § 2, requiring laborers and materialmen to whom a public contractor is indebted to file their claims within 30 days after the material shall be furnished or the work finished and to commence an action on the bond within 90 days thereafter, such a filing of claims with the board of trustees of a school district is a condition precedent to the maintenance of an action on a bond given by contractors for the construction of school buildings.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by W. O. Miles against J. H. Baley and another and the Empire State Surety Company. From a judgment against the first defendants and in favor of the last-named defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Milton M. Dearing, of Fresno, for appellant. Geo. F. Hatton and Hartley F. Peart, both of San Francisco, M. B. Harris and E. M. Harris, both of Fresno, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A hearing in this court was ordered after judgment by the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District. That court, speaking through Mr. Justice Hart, had rendered the following opinion:

This is an action on a bond, executed and given by the defendants Baley and Simpson, as principals, and the defendant surety company, as surety, to the city of Fresno school district, on a building contract.

It appears from the complaint that, on the 30th day of March, 1910, the defendants, Baley and Simpson, as copartners, entered into a contract with the city of Fresno school district for the erection upon the high school grounds in said city of a certain high school annex and shop building. Said Baley and Simpson, by said contract, agreed to furnish all necessary labor and materials, etc., required for the construction of said building in accordance with certain plans and specifications adopted for that purpose, and for which the said school district agreed to pay them the total sum of $62,029, payable in certain specified installments. Upon the execution of said contract, Baley and Simpson, as principals, and the Empire State Surety Company (to be hereafter referred to as the "surety company" or "the respondent"), as surety, made and entered into a bond to the said school district in the sum of $31,015, "conditioned as therein stated for the use and benefit of said school district and also for the use and benefit of all persons furnishing materials or supplies or furnishing or performing work or labor of any kind in the performance of said work contracted to be done by said Baley and Simpson * * * in the erection and construction of said high school annex and shop building, and delivered said bond to said * * * school district." The complaint alleges that said bond was "freely and voluntarily made and entered into" and delivered to the said school district by the parties thereto. The complaint alleges that, after the execution of the building contract above referred to, and in pursuance thereof, Baley and Simpson entered upon the work of constructing said building and received payment for their work as provided by said contract. It is further averred that various persons (naming them in different counts) furnished labor and materials to said contractors, which labor and materials were actually used by the latter in the construction of said building; that said building was completed on or about the 28th day of June, 1911, and was accepted by said school district on June 30, 1911; that the claims of the certain persons named in the complaint for providing said contractors with material and labor were not, at the time of the commencement of this action, paid by said contractors and that the same were, before the filing of the complaint herein, assigned by said persons or claimants to the plaintiff. The respondent interposed a demurrer to the complaint on both general and special grounds, and the same was sustained by the court, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his pleading within 10 days from the time of the making of the order sustaining the demurrer. The plaintiff having failed or refused to amend within the time allowed, judgment was thereupon entered against Baley and Simpson for the aggregate amount sued for ($11,913.10) and in favor of the surety company as follows: "And it is further ordered and adjudged that plaintiff take nothing against the defendant, the Empire State Surety Company, and that said defendant, the Empire State Surety Company, have and recover from plaintiff its costs incurred herein." This appeal is by the plaintiff from that portion of said judgment above quoted.

[1-4] The theory of the respondent is that the bond declared upon is a statutory bond, that is, that it was made and given in pursuance of the provisions of an act of the Legislature of 1897, entitled, "An act to secure the payment of the claims of materialmen, mechanics, or laborers, employed by contractors upon state, municipal, or other public work," approved March 27, 1897 (Stats. 1897, pp. 201, 202), and that the complaint wholly fails to state a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff as against the respondent because of the absence of a showing therein that the plaintiff or his assignors had complied with the terms of section 2 of said act as provided by section 1 thereof. Said section 2 reads as follows: "Any materialman, person, company, or corporation, furnishing materials or supplies used in the performance of the work contracted to be executed or performed, or any person who performed work or labor upon the same, or any person who supplies both work and materials, and whose claim has not been paid by the contractor, company, or corporation, to whom the contract has been awarded, shall, within thirty days from the time such work is completed, file with the commissioners, managers, trustees, officers, board of supervisors, board of trustees, common council, or other body by whom such contract was awarded, a verified statement of such claims, together with a statement that the same has not been paid. At any time within ninety days after the filing of such claim, the person, company, or corporation filing the same may commence an action against the sureties on the bond, specified and required by section one hereof." (The foregoing section was amended by the Legislature of 1911 [Stats. 1911, p. 1422] so as to extend the time of filing the verified statement, etc., to 90 days from date of the completion of the work and the time of commencing action to six months after the filing of the claim. The transactions involved here were had, however, prior to said amendments.)

That the observance of the provisions of said section of the act of 1897 is an indispensable prerequisite to the vesting of a right of action upon a bond of the character of the one involved here in materialmen, mechanics, and laborers furnishing materials for and bestowing labor upon any public work is not denied by the plaintiff; but his contention is that the instrument sued upon is a common-law bond; hence it was freely and voluntarily made and given by the defendants or, in other words, not made and given in obedience to the compulsory mandate of the statute in question. Obviously, if the instrument must or could, with legal propriety, be held to be a common-law bond, we would be required to hold that, to state a cause of action upon the bond in favor of the plaintiff, it was not essential for him to disclose by his complaint that his assignors had filed their claims with the board of trustees of said school district, as prescribed by section 2 of the act of 1897. And, e converso, if the instrument is a statutory bond, it was manifestly essential for the plaintiff to show that all the requisites of the statute, vital to the support of an action upon the bond by materialmen, etc., had been observed by his assignors, and that the silence of the complaint respecting that vital matter amounts to a total failure to state a cause of action upon the bond in favor of the plaintiff or his assignors.

The important question before us, then, is whether the instrument in controversy, which is the foundation of the plaintiff's right to a recovery, is a statutory or a common-law bond. The bond itself makes no express reference to the statute or by any language pretends to discover the source from which it comes, and it is therefore manifest that the vital question submitted here must largely be determined upon the wording of the bond or by comparing its language with that of the statute. The averment of the complaint that the defendants "freely and voluntarily made and entered into" said bond can afford no assistance in the solution of the question, since, clearly, said averment involves a mere conclusion of the pleader. The bond reads as follows:

"Know all men by these presents: That we, J. H. Baley & J. G. Simpson, as principals, and the Empire State Surety Company, a New York corporation, duly licensed under the laws of the state of California, as surety, are held and firmly bound in the sum of thirty-one thousand and fifteen (31015) dollars, lawful money of the United States of America, unto the city of Fresno school district, to be paid to said city of Fresno school district, for which payment well and truly to be made, we jointly and severally, bind ourselves, our heirs, executors and administrators, firmly by these presents.

"Sealed with our seals and dated this 30th day of March, A. D. 1910.

"The condition of the above obligation is such that said J. H. Baley and J. G. Simpson, doing a contracting business under the firm name and style of Baley & Simpson did on the 30th day of March, 1910, enter into a contract with said city of Fresno school district, a public corporation, wherein they did promise, covenant and agree to furnish all necessary materials, labor and things whatsoever including tools, implements and appliances of every kind required for the work designated, and to construct and erect an annex to the present high school building, in every particular as set forth in said contract, to which contract reference is hereby expressly made and the same and all of the terms thereof are hereby made a part and portion of this bond.

"Now therefore, if the said J. H. Baley & J. G. Simpson shall well and truly observe, fulfill, perform and keep each and all of the covenants, conditions and terms contained in said contract to the satisfaction of the city of Fresno school district and shall pay for the materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the said work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, then upon all such terms, conditions and agreements being fully complied with, and all labor, materials or supplies therefor being fully paid for, then in and in that event this obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and effect."

Section 1 of the act of 1897, above referred to, provides: "Every contractor, person, company, or corporation, to whom is awarded a contract for the execution or performance of any building, excavating, or other mechanical work, for this state, or by any county, city and county, city, town, or district therein, shall, before entering upon the performance of such work, file with the commissioners, managers, trustees, officers, board of supervisors, board of trustees, common council, or other body by whom such contract was awarded, a good and sufficient bond, to be approved by such contracting body, officers, or board, in a sum not less than one-half of the total amount payable by the terms of the contract; such bond shall be executed by the contractor, and at least two sureties, in an amount not less than the sum specified in the bond, and must provide that if the contractor, person, company, or corporation, fails to pay for any materials or supplies furnished for the performance of the work contracted to be done, or for any work or labor done thereon of any kind, that the sureties will pay the same, in an amount not exceeding the sum specified in the bond; provided, that such claims shall be filed as hereafter required."

Comparing the undertaking with the statute, it will readily be noted that that part of the former which specifies the conditions to be fulfilled by the contractors to render the undertaking inoperative or without effect is in the precise language of the statute. It is also to be observed that the amount of the bond is approximately that prescribed and required by the statute. There is no conceivable substantial difference, in substance and legal effect, between the conditions of the bond and those prescribed by the statute. Moreover, the presumption is that the board of trustees, as a public official body, performed every duty imposed upon it by law, and that, therefore, it exacted from the contractors the bond required by the statute in such cases. The language of the statute is that the contractor "shall before entering upon the performance of such work" make, give and file the bond, and appears to impose upon the governing board a mandatory duty in that regard. "Furthermore, the bond explicitly refers to the building contract, makes it a part and the consideration for the execution of the bond." Martin v. McCabe, 21 Cal. App. 658, 662, 132 Pac. 606. And, it may be remarked, as a circumstance of more or less significance in this connection, that the bond was executed on the same day that the building contract was executed.

It is obviously not necessary that the bond should expressly refer to the statute in order to constitute it a statutory bond. A bond, though not in the words of the statute requiring it to be given, if in substance and legal effect is the same as the form prescribed by such statute, is a statutory bond. McCracken v. Todd, 1 Kan. 148; Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) § 615. "A recital in such a bond that it was executed by virtue of a given section of the Code, is not controlling or conclusive. It simply furnishes prima facie evidence of the fact. When the same fact is apparent otherwise than by the recital it is as available for all purposes as if recited." S. F. Lumber Co. v. Bibb, 139 Cal. 192, 72 Pac. 964; Martin v. McCabe, 21 Cal. App. 658, 132 Pac. 606.

Again, in Republic Iron & Steel Co. v. Patillo et al., 19 Cal. App. 316, 125 Pac. 923, it is said: "While it was not alleged in the complaint, nor made the subject of any finding by the court, that the bond was given under authority of the statute, considering that the municipality was only authorized to act under permission of statutory authority in making the street improvement, and, further, that the bond in its terms was phrased according to the statutory requirement, it must be assumed that the contract was so made and the bond given in connection therewith accordingly."

The fact that one of the conditions of the bond is that the contractors will faithfully execute the terms of their contract to the satisfaction of the school district—a requirement which is not prescribed by the statute in question—is not conceived to possess any importance in determining the character of the bond. In other words, the fact referred to cannot be held to be such as to impress the instrument with the character of a common-law bond. "Where a statute provides that an official bond shall be given in a certain penalty and contain certain provisions, if the principal and surety voluntarily enter into a bond in a greater penalty or which contains more onerous conditions, the bond will be binding at least to the extent of the statutory requirements. In such case, the conditions in excess of the statutory requirements may be regarded as surplusage and the bond sustained as to the others." Brandt on Suretyship and Guaranty (3d Ed.) § 617; Board of Education v. Grant, 107 Mich. 161, 64 N. W. 1050; Central Irr. Dist. v. Delappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. 825.

The constitutional validity of the act of 1897 is not, as was true of section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the cases dealing with that section (Gibbs v. Tally, 133 Cal. 373, 65 Pac. 970, 60 L. R. A. 815; Shaughnessy v. American Sur. Co., 138 Cal. 543, 69 Pac. 250, 71 Pac. 701, and Martin v. McCabe, supra), challenged here. And it could make no difference in the result reached in this case if that question were raised and the point sustained. The proposition presented here, as shown, is simply this: Is the bond here a creature of the statute authorizing and requiring the giving of such an undertaking in cases of this character, and, if so, have the essential requirements of the statute been so complied with by the plaintiff or his assignors as to give them a right of action upon said bond? If, as we hold to be true, the bond here is the one contemplated by said act, then clearly, as the courts have held in the cases last above cited, it would be, if anything at all, a statutory bond, regardless of whether the act requiring it to be given is or is not a valid one. In other words, having been given in compliance with the statute, it could not be converted into a common-law bond by construction.

Our conclusion is, in view of the said act of 1897, and from the phraseology of the bond and the circumstances under which it was given, that said instrument was executed and delivered by the defendants to the school district in obedience to the requirements of said statute, and that it is therefore subject to all the conditions and restrictions prescribed by said act. Indeed, we cannot conceive of any reason (and surely none has been pointed out) why it should be held that the undertaking is a common-law bond.

[5] The plaintiff having failed to show by his complaint that verified statements of the claims upon which he declares were, by him or his assignors, within 30 days, from the time the work contracted for was completed, filed with the board of trustees of said school district, as required by section 2 of said act as a condition precedent to his or their right to commence and maintain an action upon said bond, it necessarily results that no cause of action in favor of the plaintiff is stated in the complaint, and that the demurrer thereto was consequently properly sustained.

The judgment is, accordingly affirmed.

The foregoing opinion, we think, makes a correct disposition of the legal questions presented by the appeal. The principal, if not the only, reason leading us to order a transfer of the cause was that the Court of Appeal did not, in its opinion, make any reference to two decisions of this court (Union Sheet Metal Works v. Dodge, 129 Cal. 390, 62 Pac. 41; People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard, 136 Cal. 55, 68 Pac. 576, which are strongly relied on by the plaintiff as supporting his contention).

It may be conceded that the opinions filed in these cases do tend to sustain the position that an instrument like the one here in suit may be upheld as a good common-law bond, without regard to the statute requiring the giving of a bond. But this view is contrary to that laid down in the later decisions cited by the District Court of Appeal. In Shaughnessy v. American Surety Co., 138 Cal. 543, 69 Pac. 250, 71 Pac. 701, it was decided that a bond, which recited that it was given in pursuance of section 1203 of the Code of Civil Procedure (an enactment which had theretofore been held to be unconstitutional) could not be enforced as a common-law bond. This was followed by S. F. Lumber Co. v. Bibb, 139 Cal. 192, 72 Pac. 964, which went a step further and held, in effect, that although the bond may not recite that it was given pursuant to the statute, the fact that it was so given may be made to appear otherwise, as by the fact that it complies with the statutory requirements governing its terms and the time and manner of its execution. The opinion in the Bibb Case mentions the further circumstance that the complaint referred to the statute, but we do not regard this as a controlling factor. The character of the bond is to be determined by its terms and the facts surrounding its execution, rather than by the conclusion of the pleader. Applying these tests, the bond here involved is, as the opinion of the District Court of Appeal shows, the bond required by the statute of 1897, and a recovery cannot be had upon it without alleging performance of the conditions imposed by the state. If Union Sheet Metal Works v. Dodge and People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard are in conflict with the views here announced, they must, to the extent of the conflict, be regarded as overruled.

The judgment is affirmed.

COREY v. STRUVE et al. (S. F. 6391.)

Rehearing Denied June 10, 1915.)

1. ACTION — 27 — CAUSE OF ACTION — COMPLAINT — CONSTRUCTION.

As the forms of action have been abolished, a complaint alleging that plaintiff leased lands to defendants, that, while defendants were in possession of the land, plaintiff was the owner of beet tops grown thereon, that defendants without right converted the tops to their own use, selling them and receiving the sum which was the value thereof, and that such sum had been demanded by plaintiff, but that the demand had been refused, will be treated as one in assumpsit to recover the value of the property wrongfully taken and used, as for goods sold, and not for conversion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 160-195; Dec. Dig. 139.]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT — 139 — CONVERSION OF CROPS — DEFENSES.

Civ. Code, § 3336, declares that the detriment caused by the wrongful conversion of personal property is presumed to be the value of the property at the time of the conversion, with interest. Section 3337 declares that the presumption cannot be repelled in favor of one whose possession was wrongful from the beginning by his subsequent application of the property to the benefit of the owner without his consent. A land lease gave the lessor the right to beet tops, and provided that the tenants should plow them under as a fertilizer for the lands. The tenants sold the tops to be used in feeding cattle kept on the land. Held that, as the tenants had possession of the beet tops for only a limited purpose, and it was changed when they sold them, they cannot defeat an action for the value of the tops on the ground that the manure from the cattle kept on the land fertilized it as much as the tops would have, but, being special trustees, having only a limited right in the tops, and having wrongfully disposed of them, they were bound by Civ. Code, §§ 2223, 2237, to compensate the owner.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by Hiram Corey against James P. Struve and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 16 Cal. App. 310, 116 Pac. 975.

Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant. J. H. Andresen and J. A. Barden, both of Salinas, and W. S. White, of Beaumont, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from an adverse judgment. The complaint contained allegations that plaintiff leased to defendants certain land in Monterey county for a term of years; that, while defendants were in possession of the said land, plaintiff was the owner of certain beet tops which had been cut from beets grown upon said property under said lease; that defendants without right converted said beet tops to their own use, sold said personal property, and received therefor the sum of $3,271.27, which was the value thereof at the time of conversion; that said amount of money, with interest thereon, had been demanded by plaintiff from defendants; but that the latter had refused to comply with plaintiff's demands. Plaintiff also pleaded a prior judgment in which plaintiff was declared to be the owner of the beet tops.

Defendants by their answer admitted plaintiff's ownership of the beet tops, but alleged that such ownership was limited and special, for the sole purpose of having the beet tops remain upon the ground where they had been grown and cut, defendants being entitled to the possession of said beet tops for the purpose of plowing them under as a fertilizer. They also admitted the existence of the judgment declaring plaintiff's ownership of the personalty in question, but declared that such ownership was the sort of limited one which they had pleaded. They further alleged that, with plaintiff's permission, they had sold the beet tops to be fed to cattle on the premises, and averred that the fertilizing effect of feeding the beet tops upon the ground where they had been grown and cut was greater than that produced by plowing under, and they denied that plaintiff had been injured by their conduct, but asserted that he had been greatly benefited thereby.

The court found that plaintiff had a qualified, special, and limited ownership in the property, "in this, that neither the plaintiff nor the defendants had any right to remove any of said beet tops from said leased lands, but it was the duty of the defendants, as tenants of the plaintiff, to plow said beet tops under as a fertilizer of said leased lands." There were further findings that defendants had sold the beet tops for the aggregate sum alleged; that the beet tops had been eaten by the cattle of the purchasers upon the leased property; and "that the fertilizing benefit to lands derived from the ordure and urine of cattle while feeding beet tops as said beet tops were fed is equivalent to the fertilizing benefit the lands receive when the beet tops are plowed under, and for this reason the plaintiff was not damaged and sustained no detriment by the conduct of the defendants in selling said beet tops and feeding them to cattle upon said leased premises." It was also found that plaintiff did not consent to the sale of the beet tops. At the trial there was expert testimony which tended to support the finding of the equivalent value of the substituted fertilizer.

The only question to be determined, therefore, is whether or not tenants, bound under the terms of their lease to use a landlord's property in a certain way, may subvert said property to another, and to them a profitable, use, and escape all liability because the benefit to the realty was as great as that which was contemplated by the landlord in covenanting for the disposition of the personal property. At the outset respondents insist that this is an action for conversion.

[1] While the complaint does allege that the property was "converted" by the defendants, we think that the action was in reality one in assumpsit for the value of the property sold, or perhaps it might be more aptly characterized as one in the nature of a suit for money had and received. In this state one whose goods are wrongfully taken and used by another may sue in assumpsit for their value as for goods sold and delivered. Bechtel v. Chase, 156 Cal. 711, 106 Pac. 81; Fountain v. Sacramento, 1 Cal. App. 462, 82 Pac. 637; Atkins v. Gamble, 42 Cal. 100, 10 Am. Rep. 282; Fratt v. Clark, 12 Cal. 90. But we are not here greatly concerned about the particular form of the action. In this state we have but one form of action which has no special designation, and it cannot be defeated as at common law because not properly named. Faulkner v. First National Bank, 130 Cal. 263, 62 Pac. 463. Such an action as this is governed by equitable principles (Crocker-Woolworth Bank v. Nevada Bank, 139 Cal. 571, 73 Pac. 456, 63 L. R. A. 245, 96 Am. St. Rep. 169), and, applying such principles, particularly the maxim that "no man shall profit by his own wrong," we cannot agree with respondents in their contention that they are entitled to any "side profit" from the sale of the beet tops.

[2] The learned judge who presided at the trial of the case based his decision upon these propositions: (1) Plaintiff's ownership in the beet tops was qualified, extending only to his right to have them plowed under; (2) the measure of damages would be the value of the property converted; (3) the manure resulting from keeping the cattle on the land was equivalent as a fertilizer to the beet tops plowed under; (4) defendants could make such defense because their possession was not "wrongful from the beginning." Section 3337, Civ. Code.

The sort of ownership enjoyed by the plaintiff is a false quantity because the defendants were not and did not claim to be owners of any part of the beet tops. So far as they were concerned the plaintiff had full title to the property, and the fact that he was bound by his contract to allow them to apply his property to the enrichment of land from which they were to get a portion of the crops did not make them part owners of the beet tops. The rule that the owners of a special interest in property may recover only to the extent of such interest applies only to cases where the suit is brought against the owner of the remaining interest or his assignee. California C. F. Ass'n v. Ainsworth, 134 Cal. 463, 66 Pac. 586. The tops had a value as a fertilizer when plowed under and a value as cattle food. If the owner chose to enter into a contract whereby his tenants were to plow the tops under, surely the tenants' violation of that agreement could not clothe them with proprietorship of the feed. Suppose, instead of beet tops, the property had been horses and plows which under the lease the tenants were bound to use only upon the landlord's acres, delivering the implements and animals to the owner at the end of the season in good condition, and suppose that after doing the plowing on their landlord's fields the tenants had rented the personal property to a neighbor on the theory that the exercise was good for the horses and the extra plowing efficacious for keeping the rust from the plows, would any one contend that the tenants might retain the fruits of the unauthorized exploitation of their landlord's property? So in the case before us the unauthorized profit should belong to the person whose property earned it.

The lower court held that the presumption declared by section 3336 of the Civil Code was repelled by showing an application of the property to the benefit of the owner. It is true that section 3337 of the Civil Code provides that:

"The presumption declared by the last section cannot be repelled, in favor of one whose possession was wrongful from the beginning, by his subsequent application of the property to the benefit of the owner, without his consent."

But that section was never intended to apply to a case where the owner received a mere consequential benefit. It was only intended to affect cases where the entire beneficial value of the property was applied to the use of the owner. Appellant contends that the possession of the beet tops by respondents may not be characterized as rightful from the beginning because, although they had possession for a special purpose, the different sort of possession which they took, by means of the cattle, for the purpose of destroying the beet tops, was a trespass, and was wrongful from the beginning; but, assuming that their possession was rightful within the meaning of section 3337, Civil Code, they did not show a subsequent application of plaintiff's property or the selling price thereof to his benefit.

In the absence of an express agreement with the owners, the defendants could by no possibility have any interest in the proceeds of the sale of his property. Their only agreement was not with reference to the proceeds of a sale, but related to their right to have the vegetable matter applied in the form in which it then existed to the land of which they were tenants. This right they waived when they disposed of the beet tops. They then sold another man's property with which they had been intrusted for a special purpose. A trustee who disposes of trust property must replace it with its fruits or account for its proceeds with interest. Section 2237, Civ. Code. One who wrongfully detains a thing is an involuntary trustee thereof for the benefit of the owner. Section 2223, Civ. Code.

It follows from the above discussion that plaintiff was entitled to the proceeds of the sale of his property wrongfully made by defendants, and that the decision to the contrary was erroneous.

The judgment is therefore reversed.

1. JUDGMENT $\S$ 106—MISJOINDER OF CAUSES—AMENDMENTS.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco.

Action by L. H. Start against Florence

Heinzerling. From the judgment dismissing the complaint and an order opening defendant's default, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, and cause remanded.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, for appellant. Cornelius W. Kelly, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. In this action the plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $830. Two causes of action were separately pleaded, one for moneys had and received, and the other for damages alleged to have resulted to the plaintiff from a conspiracy claimed to have been entered into by the defendants against the plaintiff. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment of dismissal, entered upon the theory that the plaintiff had failed to amend his complaint within the time granted after an order had been made sustaining the defendant's demurrer.

Incidentally the plaintiff complains of orders made intermediate the judgment, which present a peculiar entanglement of the procedure employed in the attempted adjudication of the subject-matter of the action. In this connection the record shows that service of summons was made upon the defendant, Florence Heinzerling, by publication. After the statutory time allowed her to appear and defend had expired, she procured an order giving her an extension of two days' time within which to plead to the plaintiff's complaint. Thereafter and before the two days' extension of time had expired, her default was entered, apparently upon the theory that the order extending her time to plead had been inadvertently and improvidently made. Subsequently, however, the defendant's default was set aside upon motion, which, although supported by an affidavit which tended to show that her default was due to excusable neglect, was not accompanied by an affidavit of merits.

Upon the opening of the default the defendant interposed a demurrer to the complaint upon the grounds that it did not state a cause of action, and that a cause of action upon a contract was improperly united with a cause of action upon an alleged tort. The demurrer was sustained, and within the time granted the plaintiff's cause of action for damages was upon his motion ordered stricken out and dismissed. The plaintiff, however, deeming it necessary that the court should reconsider its ruling upon the demurrer, a motion to that effect was granted upon the condition that the plaintiff file an amended complaint within a specified time. The plaintiff failed to comply with the condition, and a judgment of dismissal was accordingly entered against him.

[1] The plaintiff now insists that the order striking out and dismissing the cause of action for damages, made upon his motion and with his consent, was tantamount to an amendment of his complaint, and that therefore the judgment of dismissal must be reversed if it can be said that his complaint as thus amended stated a cause of action. This contention, we think, is well taken. A cause of action for moneys had and received is pleaded in the usual and ordinary form, and apparently is perfectly stated. This being so, and the order striking out and dismissing the cause of action for damages having cured the defect of misjoinder which originally existed in the complaint, the lower court should have reconsidered its order sustaining the demurrer, and, if it had done so, doubtless would have overruled the demurrer, in so far as it applied to the first cause of action. A formal rewriting of the complaint was not necessary to its amendment in order to permit a reconsideration of the demurrer. In any event, treating the complaint as amended to meet the main objection of the demurrer, we find the situation to be that the court in effect sustained the demurrer to a cause of action of the complaint upon the ground of the insufficiency of the facts stated to constitute a cause of action which, upon its face, was not rightfully subject to demurrer upon that or any other ground. Consequently the judgment of dismissal cannot stand.

[2, 3] The motion of the defendant to set aside the default should not have been heard and determined in the absence of an affidavit of merits. The default of the defendant was tantamount to an admission of the material facts pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint (Rowe v. Table Mountain Water Co., 10 Cal. 441; Madison v. Octave Oil Co., 154 Cal. 768, 99 Pac. 176); and it is elementary that before a default, which the court had jurisdiction to enter, may be set aside, it must appear that the defendant has a meritorious defense to the action. Such a showing is ordinarily required to be made by affidavit of merits, and should have been so made in the present case. Perhaps if the court had entered the default before the expiration of the defendant's time to plead, no affidavit of merits would have been required, because the court would then have acted in excess of its jurisdiction; but that is not the case here. The record shows that the defendant procured an extension of time to plead only after the statutory time had fully elapsed; and it is well settled that an order granting an extension of time, made after the expiration of the statutory time, is void, and may be rightfully ignored. In re Clary, 112 Cal. 292, 44 Pac. 569. Consequently the order setting aside the defendant's default must be reversed; but we have no doubt that upon the going down of the remittitur the lower court may, in the exercise of its discretion and in furtherance of justice, permit the defendant upon a further hearing and consideration of the motion to set aside the default, to supplement the showing already made with an affidavit of merits.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and the order setting aside the default are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

1. WORK AND LABOR ⇨5—COMPENSATION—CONTRACTS.

2. WORK AND LABOR ⇨4—COMPENSATION—CONTRACTS.

An implied promise to pay for services rendered and accepted may be rebutted by proof that the services were intended to be gratuitous or by circumstances from which the law raises the presumption that the services were not intended to be compensated, such as when rendered between members of the same household, or between those closely related by blood; and, to authorize compensation in such cases, the circumstances must warrant the inference that it was the expectation of both parties that compensation should be made.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by B. Spadoni against E. G. Giacomazzi. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, for appellant. W. S. White, of Beaumont, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. In the month of September, 1909, the plaintiff was the owner of real and personal property in the county of Monterey; and while he was absent serving a term of imprisonment at San Quentin, the defendant, acting under a power of attorney, looked after and managed his property until his discharge in the month of March, 1912. Subsequently the defendant rendered to the plaintiff a statement of his receipts and disbursements as manager of said property, but plaintiff, being dissatisfied with such statement, commenced this action for an accounting. The defendant, in addition to his answer putting in issue all of the allegations of the complaint, filed a cross-complaint, in which he claimed $750 for his services in looking after the plaintiff's property and family during the latter's enforced absence. Judgment went for defendant on his cross-complaint in the sum of $687.81, a balance arrived at after crediting him with the aforesaid item of $750.

[1, 2] As to this item we agree with the plaintiff that the evidence does not sustain the finding by the trial court that the defendant is entitled to this sum for services. Defendant admits that there was no agreement that he should be compensated for his services; and he also admits, at least by implication, that when he undertook the work he did not intend to charge therefor. In this connection it is proper to say that if later he found the duties of the undertaking more onerous than he had expected, and therefore changed his mind and decided to charge for the same, it was his duty to have established a contract with the plaintiff, express or implied, to that effect. 15 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1079. This was not done. The defendant also not only admitted that he might have told the plaintiff's son that he was making no charge for the services in question, but also testified in effect that it had not occurred to him to do so until the plaintiff commenced this action. The defendant was engaged in the saloon business a short distance from the plaintiff's ranch, and was attending to the bar at night. The services rendered on the ranch were of a minor character; and it is quite plain, we think, from the record—the plaintiff being the defendant's father-in-law—that the motive which prompted the services was a desire to help the plaintiff's wife and son, a mere youth, in the management of the small stock farm, springing from friendship, and that there was not even a remote expectation of pecuniary profit.

"That a promise to pay for services rendered and accepted is implied, * * * is liable to be rebutted * * * by proof that the services were intended to be gratuitous, or even by particular circumstances, from which the law would raise the counter presumption that the services were not intended to be a charge against the party who was benefited thereby." * * * When the services are rendered between members of the same household or between those most closely related by blood, "we find other motives than a desire of gain, which may prompt the exchange of mutual benefits between them." * * * Our own decisions appear to support the doctrine that to authorize compensation in such cases the circumstances must be such as to warrant the inference that it was the expectation of both parties that compensation should be made, * * * that it is the expectations of the parties existing while the relation continued that is to control, and * * * no circumstance occurring afterwards can convert into an implied contract, that which was not so before." Crane v. Derrick, 157 Cal. 667, 671, 109 Pac. 31, 32.

"The presumption" that services are to be compensated "ceases to exist when it is shown that they were merely such offices as one friend would perform for another in time of sickness or distress." Dallman v. Frank, 1 Cal. App. 541, 82 Pac. 564.

Where there was no intent to claim compensation for services rendered, at the time they were rendered, no recovery can be had therefor. Evans v. Henry, 66 Ill. App. 144.

A party performing services for another without intending to charge therefor, and under such circumstances as to lead the latter to believe that no charge will be made, cannot recover therefor. Jones v. Clark, 28 Iowa, 593.

"No one is bound to pay for volunteered services rendered under circumstances which do not fairly indicate an expectation of reward." Covel v. Turner, 74 Mich. 408, 41 N. W. 1091; Strother v. Dewitt, 98 Mo. App. 293, 71 S. W. 1129; D. Sullivan & Co. v. Owens (Tex. Civ. App.) 90 S. W. 690.

When the relation of the parties is such as to negative the idea that services were rendered in expectation of payment, compensation cannot be recovered. In re Cooper, 6 Misc. Rep. 501, 27 N. Y. Supp. 425.

As to the other items in the record, it might well be deemed that the defendant, having no brief in this court, is unable to answer the contentions of the plaintiff with reference to them. But be that as it may, the record is in such condition that we are unable to intelligently discuss those items; and since from what we have just said it appears that the judgment and order must be reversed, it will be unnecessary to do so.

Judgment and order reversed.

SAN FRANCISCO COMMERCIAL AGENCY
v. McKEON et al. (Civ. 1469.)

PLEADING — 205 — ACTION AGAINST GARNISHEE—COMPLAINT—GENERAL DEMURRER.

A complaint which alleges that on a designated day defendant became indebted to plaintiff in a specified sum by virtue of a writ of garnishment being served on defendant by a sheriff in an action in which plaintiff was plaintiff and a third person defendant, is good in the absence of a special demurrer, though the statute requires the sheriff, in executing the writ, not only to leave a copy of the writ with the garnishee, but also a notice that the debt owing by him to defendant is attached.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by the San Francisco Commercial Agency against Neal J. McKeon and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. M. Anthony and Herbert S. Goold, both of San Francisco, for appellants. Perry & Perry, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants, brought to this court upon the judgment roll. The sole point presented for determination is as to whether or not the trial court, in overruling the defendants' general demurrer to the complaint, committed error.

The complaint alleges that:

"On the 14th day of February, 1913, defendants became indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $383.90 by virtue of a certain writ of garnishment being served upon said defendants by the sheriff of the county of Alameda" in that certain action "in which the San Francisco Commercial Agency was the plaintiff, and one Margaret Hall the defendant."

The statute on the subject, it is true, in the case of a garnishment, requires that the sheriff, in executing the writ, shall not only leave a copy of the writ with the person owing the debt to the defendant, but also a notice that the debt owing by him to the defendant is attached in pursuance of such writ. But we think the complaint, in the absence of a special demurrer, states sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action; and it was so held in the recent case of Midway Five Oil Co. v. Citizens' Nat. Bank of Los Angeles, 143 Pac. 800.

Judgment affirmed.

1. ACTION — 15 — CAUSE OF ACTION — SAME PERSON PLAINTIFF AND DEFENDANT.

Though ordinarily courts will not entertain jurisdiction of an action where plaintiff and defendant are the same person, the court will take jurisdiction of an action on a claim against a decedent's estate, though the guardian of the insane claimant and the administrator of decedent are the same person, where the action is brought and defended in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Rose Haberly, by E. T. Morton, her guardian ad litem, against William T. Haberly, as administrator of George W. Haberly, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. White, of San Francisco, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff in this action recovered a judgment against the defendant, as the administrator of the estate of George W. Haberly, deceased, in the sum of $800, with interest thereon from the 29th day of March, 1901. George W. Haberly died in the city and county of San Francisco on the 5th day of December, 1910. Thereafter, on March 11, 1911, his brother, William T. Haberly, was appointed administrator of his estate with the will annexed. Prior thereto, to wit, on the 24th day of January, 1911, William T. Haberly had been appointed as the guardian of the person and estate of his mother, Rose Haberly, an insane person. On August 31, 1911, William T. Haberly, as guardian of Rose Haberly, presented to the judge of the superior court in which the estate of George W. Haberly, deceased, was pending for probate, a claim in the sum sued for, which claim was rejected by the judge. On November 29, 1911, William T. Haberly, as guardian of Rose Haberly, instituted an action on the rejected claim in the estate which he represented as administrator. Demurrers to the complaint and an amended complaint in the action were sustained, and subsequently one E. T. Morton was appointed guardian ad litem of Rose Haberly, who, for a cause of action in a second amended complaint alleged practically all of the matters and things set forth in the complaint originally filed by William T. Haberly.

At the outset it is insisted that the trial court should not have entertained jurisdiction of the action in the face of the objection that the papers, pleadings, and proof showed that the appointment of the guardian ad litem was suggested by the defendant, William T. Haberly. Because of this fact it is contended that the motion for judgment of dismissal made by the counsel who defended the action, and was the attorney for the residuary legatee under the will of the deceased, should have been granted, because, as was claimed, the action was one, in effect, wherein the same person was appearing as both plaintiff and defendant.

[1] It is the rule ordinarily, and for reasons that are obvious, that courts will not entertain jurisdiction of an action where the plaintiff and defendant are, in fact, one and the same person; but the rule has no application to the facts of the present case. The claim of the plaintiff against the estate of George W. Haberly, deceased, having been rejected by the court in which the estate was pending, relegated her to an action upon the claim; and she could not be deprived of that remedy merely because the guardian of her person and estate happened to be at the same time the administrator of the estate of the deceased. The suggestion that a guardian ad litem be appointed for the purpose of bringing suit was apparently made in good faith, and it does not appear here that the action was instituted for the purpose of procuring a collusive judgment. That the action was defended in good faith is evidenced by the vigorous defense interposed by the counsel, who, nominally representing William T. Haberly, in fact appeared in and defended the action as the attorney for the residuary legatee under the will of the deceased, who was the one person most interested in the defense of the action.

[2] Conceding for the sake of argument that the plaintiff's complaint was demurrable upon the ground of uncertainty in certain particulars, nevertheless the error, if any, in the order overruling the demurrer does not appear to have placed the defendant at a disadvantage, and therefore, after judgment rendered upon the facts, must be held to have been harmless. Huffner v. Sawday, 153 Cal. 86, 94 Pac. 424; Widemann v. Digges, 21 Cal. App. 342, 131 Pac. 882.

The pleaded and proven facts of the case upon which the claim of the plaintiff was founded are substantially these: The Eintracht Bund, a fraternal society of which Frederick Haberly, deceased, the husband of the plaintiff, was a member, had, after the plaintiff had been declared incompetent, and during the period of her incompetency, paid the sum of $800 to George W. Haberly, a son, for and on account of the insurance which became due and payable upon the death of Frederick Haberly. Frederick Haberly left a last will and testament, in which he specifically bequeathed the sum due upon his death for life insurance from the Eintracht Bund to his son, George W. Haberly, who was also nominated and subsequently appointed as the administrator of the father's estate. The trial court, in accord with the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint, found that:

"In his lifetime * * * Frederick Haberly was a member of the Eintracht Bund, a benevolent society of San Francisco, * * * and upon the death of said Frederick Haberly, by reason of his membership in said society, the sum of $800 became due and payable to his widow, * * * Rose Haberly; that on the 29th day of March, 1901, George W. Haberly, a son of * * * Rose Haberly, received said sum of $800 from the Eintracht Bund * * * for and on behalf of his mother, * * * who was then, ever since has been, and now is incarcerated in the state hospital for the insane at Stockton."

[3, 4] The principal point made in support of the appeal relates to the insufficiency of the evidence to support the foregoing findings, and deals largely, if not entirely, with the construction which should be placed upon the by-laws of the Eintracht Bund which designated the persons who might become the beneficiaries of its insurance. It is conceded that the by-law in question was a controlling constituent of the contract for insurance entered into between the Eintracht Bund and Frederick Haberly, and that the will of the latter was of no avail if it named as a beneficiary of the insurance a person not entitled thereto under the by-law. The by-law in question was printed and promulgated in the German language; and, although offered and received in evidence upon the trial, the trial court had, as we have, only liberal translations of the same. The translation of Mr. Frederick Huber, a member of the Eintracht Bund, and who participated in the preparation of its by-laws, was that:

"A married member must leave the money either to his wife or children, and it is not necessary for him to make a will, because the money belongs to the widow, and, if there is no such widow, the children. He can make a will if he wants to, but he cannot thereby affect the persons to whom the money will be paid upon his death. If there is no such children, and the member not living with his wife, then he can make a will. It is only when there is no children and the wife is dead [that] he can make a will."

Henry Gumbell, the treasurer of the Eintracht Bund, testified as a witness for the plaintiff for the purpose of translating the by-law in question; and in that behalf was questioned and made answers as follows:

"Q. Would you kindly read those provisions to which I have referred? A. (reading). The insurance of a married member goes to his wife—The Court: Q. A married member must insure to his wife? A. Yes; or to his children if he don't have no wife. Q. Continue reading that paragraph. A. If he has no wife, he makes it to the children; the children is next."

Upon behalf of the defendant a translation, which was accepted by counsel for the plaintiff, was offered and received in evidence reading as follows:

"A married member must leave the insurance either to his wife or his children; and it is not necessary for him to make a will, as the money will be paid to the widow, or, if none outlive him, to the children."

Standing solely upon the last-quoted translation, counsel for the defendant insists that the by-law in question must be construed to mean that, while a married member of the Eintracht Bund need not make a will disposing of his insurance money, yet, if he does make a will, he is privileged to leave the insurance money to either his wife or his children, as he prefers. The correctness of this translation cannot be conceded. True, this construction finds support in the first clause of the defendant's translation, which reads that, "A married member must leave the insurance to either his wife or his children;" but this clause alone falls far short of controlling the intent and purpose of the by-law; and the concluding clause of the by-law as translated by the defendant, which provides that "it is not necessary for him (the member) to make a will, as the money will be paid to the widow, or, if none outlive him, to the children," fortifies the construction contended for by the plaintiff. The trial court was not limited in its interpretation of the by-law in question to the translation thereof offered by the defendant, but it had the right to resort, as it evidently did, to the testimony and translations of the witnesses Gumbel and Huber for the purpose of determining the meaning and intent of the by-law; and, when the translation of the defendant in its entirety is considered and construed in conjunction with the testimony and translations of the witnesses for the plaintiff, we have no doubt but that the evidence adduced upon the whole case warrants and sustains the interpretation, evidently adopted by the trial court, that under the by-laws of the Eintracht Bund the insurance money of a deceased member, without regard to the will of the deceased, will go to and must be paid to the widow of the deceased member, or, if there be no widow, then to his children.

[5] There was no error in the ruling of the trial court sustaining the objection to a question propounded to a witness for the defendant as follows:

"Do you know of your own knowledge whether George W. Haberly ever paid your mother, Rose Haberly, any money or contributed any funds toward her support?"

The answer of the defendant did not purport to plead a set-off against the claim of the plaintiff, but merely denied upon lack of information and belief that the money alleged to have been received by George W. Haberly had not been paid to the plaintiff. Undoubtedly the defendant was entitled under a general denial to show payment, if he could, in whole or in part of the money in suit; but that was not the purpose of the question objected to. Plainly the purpose of the question was to elicit evidence the only tendency of which would be to show that he had paid or contributed money towards the support of his mother, which fact, if established, would not be evidence of payment in the strict sense of the term, but rather would be evidence only of the existence of a counterclaim; and it is a well-settled rule of law in this state that the subject-matter of a counterclaim is not admissible in evidence unless it be affirmatively pleaded. Bernard v. Mulloy, 1 Cal. 368; Hicks v. Green, 9 Cal. 74; Quinn v. Smith, 49 Cal. 163; Matter of Coutts, 100 Cal. 400, 34 Pac. 865.

[6] There is no merit in the contention that the action could not be maintained until the claim upon which it was founded was formally rejected by the administrator. The claim was duly presented to the administrator, who failed to act thereon within the prescribed statutory time; and subsequently it was presented to and rejected by the judge presiding over the court in which the estate was pending probate. The rejection of a claim against an estate by either the executor or administrator or a judge of the superior court entitled the claimant to bring suit thereon; and the neglect of the administrator in the present case to act upon the claim within ten days after it had been presented to him was the equivalent of a rejection. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1496, 1498.

This, we think, disposes of all of the points made in support of the appeal which are worthy of serious consideration.

1. CARRIERS — 2 — STATUTES — CHARGES — IMPLIED REPEAL.

St. 1877-78, p. 18, § 1, declares that no street railroad in any city or town with more than 100,000 inhabitants shall be allowed to charge more than five cents fare for each passenger for a trip of any distance, and that a violation shall expose the owner to a forfeiture of $250 in favor of the person so unlawfully charged. Civ. Code, § 501, adopted in 1872, was in 1903 (St. 1903, p. 172), re-enacted so as to provide that the rates of fare should not exceed ten cents for one fare for any distance under three miles, but that in municipalities of the first class they should not exceed five cents. Held that, while implied repeals are not favored, yet section 501, as re-enacted, is apparently a revision of the earlier statute, which was repealed by implication, and so act of 1878 is not applicable to the city of Los Angeles, though it had over a population of 100,000.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ¶ 2.]

2. STATUTES $\S$ 169—REVIVAL OF ACT REPEALED—CARRIERS.

Public Utilities Act (St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 62) $\S$ 82, which follows Const. art. 12, $\S$ 23, declares that the act shall not affect the powers of control over a public utility vested in a city or incorporated town which a majority of the qualified electors shall vote to continue unimpaired. St. 1911, p. 2051, confers upon the city of Los Angeles the power to regulate street car rates. The Public Utilities Act generally regulated street car rates. Held, in the absence of action by the city, the general statute applied governing the rates, and an earlier statute which had been repealed was not revived.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Harry L. Suydam against the Los Angeles Railway Company, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. O. Graves, of Los Angeles, and Cole & Brown, of Nelson, Neb., for appellant. O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin and Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the plaintiff seeks to recover certain penalties to which he claims to have become entitled under the provisions of "an act to limit and fix the rates of fares on street railroads in cities of more than 100,000 inhabitants," approved January 1, 1878 (Stats. 1877-78, p. 18). Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant after an order sustaining its demurrer to the complaint. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1] Section 1 of the act of 1878 reads as follows:

"No street railroad in any city or town of this state, with more than 100,000 inhabitants, shall be allowed to charge or collect a higher rate of fare than five cents for each passenger per trip of any distance in one direction, either going or coming, along any part of the whole length of the road or its connections."

The next section provides:

"Every violation of the provisions of section 1 of this act shall subject the owner or owners of the street railroad violating the same to a forfeiture to the person so unlawfully charged, or paying more than is therein allowed to be charged, the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars for each and every instance when such unlawful charge is made or collected, to be recovered by suit in any court of competent jurisdiction; such causes of action shall be assignable, and the action may be maintained by the assignee in his own name, and several causes of action arising out of unlawful charges or collections from different persons may be vested in the assignee and united in the same action."

If this act was in force in May, 1912, when the alleged charges of ten cents per trip were made, the plaintiff's complaint stated a cause of action, and the demurrer was improperly sustained.

Section 501 of the Civil Code, as adopted in 1872, provided as to street railroad corporations that:

"The rates of fare on the cars must not exceed ten cents for one fare for any distance under three miles. * * * A violation of the provisions of this section subjects the corporation to a fine of one hundred dollars for each offense."

Section 504, Civil Code, also enacted in 1872, says:

"Any corporation, or agent or employé thereof, demanding or charging a greater sum of money for fare on the cars of such street railroad than that fixed, as provided in this title, forfeits to the person from whom such sum is received, or who is thus overcharged, the sum of two hundred dollars, to be recovered in a civil action, in any justice's court having jurisdiction thereof, against the corporation."

In the year 1903 (St. 1903, p. 172) section 501 of the Civil Code was re-enacted in amended form, and the amendment, so far as applicable here, consisted in adding certain words to the first sentence of the section so that the same reads as follows:

"The rates of fare on the cars must not exceed ten cents for one fare for any distance under three miles, and in municipal corporations of the first class must not exceed five cents for each passenger per trip of any distance in one direction either going or coming, along any part of the whole length of the road or its connections."

The alleged excessive charges to plaintiff were made in the city of Los Angeles. According to the census of the year 1900, the city of Los Angeles had a population of 102,479; and according to the census of 1910 it had a population of 319,189. In 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 94) an act was adopted for the classification of cities in California whereby those cities having a population of more than 200,000 constituted the first class, and those having a population of more than 100,000 and not exceeding 200,000 constituted the first and one-half class. By a similar act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 476) all cities having a population of more than 400,000 constitute the first class, and those having a population of more than 250,000 and not exceeding 400,000 are in the first and one-half class. It thus appears that at the time of adoption of the 1903 amendment to section 501 of the Civil Code the city of Los Angeles was, and in May, 1912, it was, and ever since has been, a city of the first and one-half class; and not until the census of 1900 was it established as a city of more than 100,000 inhabitants.

From the foregoing facts it further appears that the above-quoted act of 1878 did not apply to the city of Los Angeles until the year 1900. From that time until the present (except for a few months between the time of taking the 1910 federal census and the time when the reclassification act of 1911 became effective) it has been applicable to that city, if the act itself is still in force.

It should be noted that the words describing the five-cent-fare limit as added to section 501 by the act of 1903 are identical with the corresponding part of section 1 of the act of 1878; that is to say, "five cents for each passenger per trip of any distance in one direction, either going or coming, along any part of the whole length of the road or its connections." But, whereas the five-cent limit described in the act of 1878 is made applicable to cities "with more than one hundred thousand inhabitants," the words used in the amendment to section 501 are "in municipal corporations of the first class." It is reasonable to assume that the Legislature, in enacting this kind of an amendment to the statutory law, has in view the conditions existing as to population and classification in the several cities of the state. If it had been intended merely to codify the act of 1878 by transferring section 1 thereof into section 501 of the Civil Code, the words, "with more than one hundred thousand inhabitants" would have been transferred, instead of substituting the words "in municipal corporations of the first class." That this amendment was made for the purpose of codifying and at the same time amending the earlier statute is sufficiently clear from the identity of the subject-matter and from the duplication of language as to the rate of fare prescribed and the change in phraseology as to description of the kind of corporation in which the rule prescribed is made applicable. This reasonable view of the matter is further confirmed by the history of the legislation and the fact that section 501, as amended in 1903, is in the same language as the amendment proposed by the Code commissioners, which the Legislature attempted to adopt by an act passed in 1901, which act, however, on account of the insufficiency of its title, was declared to be void. The report of the Code commissioners, whose recommendations were followed by said act of 1901, plainly shows that the purpose of the proposed amendment was to transfer into the Civil Code, with some amendment, the legislation contained in the act of 1878. While this historical matter is not at all conclusive, yet it is somewhat persuasive when it coincides, as it does, with the natural reason of the matter.

Having thus considered the foregoing several steps in legislation, together with the conditions to which they were intended to apply, we are led to the conclusion that section 501 of the Civil Code, as amended in 1903, together with the already existing section 504, Civil Code, was intended as a substitute for the act of 1878, as well as for the original section 501.

"While it is true that repeals by implication are not favored, whenever it becomes apparent that a later statute is revisory of the entire matter of an earlier statute, and is designed as a substitute for it, the later statute will prevail, and the earlier statute will be held to have been superseded, even though there be found no inconsistencies or repugnancies between the two." Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 132, 58 Pac. 372, 373.

[2] It is further contended by respondent that whatever provisions of law existed by virtue of any of the foregoing statutes were superseded by the public utilities act, which became effective on the 23d day of March, 1912 (Stats. 1911, Ex. Sess. p. 18). Section 27 of that act states a general rule concerning street car fares within the corporate limits of cities. Section 73a provides a rule of damages to be recovered in civil actions on account of violations by any public utility of the provisions of the Constitution or any law of this state or any order or decision of the Railroad Commission. Section 76a provides for penalties to be recovered on account of violations of the provisions of the Constitution of this state or of said public utilities act. Section 87 declares that "all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed." Respondent's position as to the result of the public utilities act as affecting earlier statutes is not seriously disputed as to its general effect. But it is claimed by appellant that the provisions of said act are not applicable to the city of Los Angeles, and that therefore the act of 1878 (assuming it to have survived the 1903 amendment of section 501, Civil Code) remains in force within that city.

Section 82 of the public utilities act (closely following section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution as amended October 10, 1911) in part reads as follows:

"This act shall not affect such powers of control over any public utility vested in any city and county or incorporated city or town as, at an election to be held pursuant to laws to be hereafter passed by the Legislature, a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon of such city and county, or incorporated city or town, shall vote to retain, and until such election such powers shall continue unimpaired in such city and county or incorporated city or town."

In March, 1911, the city of Los Angeles, by virtue of charter amendments, became vested with power to regulate street railway fares. Stats. 1911, pt. 2, p. 2051 et seq. If, in the exercise of this power, the city of Los Angeles has enacted its own local regulations, those regulations have superseded the general laws, and any statute in force which otherwise would govern as to the public utility in question is superseded in its operation and effect so long as the city chooses to continue in the exercise of its paramount right of control. The complaint in the case at bar is silent upon the subject of action or nonaction by the city of Los Angeles in the exercise of the power so reserved; and perhaps we would be justified in assuming, against the plaintiff, that the supposed regulations have been made. But, even if the city has remained inactive as to this matter, that does not aid the plaintiff's case. For in this event the public utilities act, rather than the preceding statutes, would apply, and a statutory penalty claimed under the act of 1878 could not be recovered. The public utilities act is a general law, effective throughout the state, except only that its operation within a city having a charter like that of the city of Los Angeles is superseded whenever and so long as such city continues in the exercise of its powers of regulation of the public utility in question. But the provisions of section 82 above quoted and the provisions of the Constitution (article 12, § 23) go only to the extent of preventing any interference with the municipal right of control where such control exists and is exercised. Such legislation as that of the public utilities act, when enacted, is complete as a law of the state; but it is provided that such law shall not have any such effect as will interfere with a city in the exercise of certain municipal powers which, under the Constitution, are made superior to the general law. The provisions of the Constitution intended to preserve the self-governing powers of certain cities with respect to these matters were not intended to place any limitation upon the power of the state to substitute one general law for another.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

FRANSCIONI v. SOLEDAD LAND & WATER CO. (S. F. 6538.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1915.
Rehearing Denied June 17, 1915.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨154 — WATER RIGHT—IRRIGATION—EASEMENT.

The predecessor of a corporation owning a water plant owned land purchased under an agreement binding him as part of the consideration to develop the water, erect a pumping plant, and subdivide the land into suitable farm lots ditched for irrigation. He complied with this agreement, and thereafter agreed to sell two lots with appurtenances to plaintiff's grantor, and a deed reserving the right to maintain ditches was executed to such grantor by the corporation, which in the meantime had been formed and had taken over the water plant. Prior thereto and for several years thereafter water was regularly delivered to such lots and used thereon for irrigation. Held, that the irrigation of the lots by the corporation's predecessor and their subsequent sale with the irrigation system in operation created an easement appurtenant to the lots and a corresponding servitude on the water system, whereby plaintiff became entitled to demand from the water system a supply of water for irrigation of the lots purchased, and the corporation became bound to continue the supply as long as the source held out.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 167-173; Dec. Dig. ⇨154.]

2. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨253 — WATER COMPANIES — IRRIGATION — EASEMENT.

Plaintiff, in such case, also became entitled to receive the water from the corporation under Civ. Code, § 552, providing that, when a domestic corporation furnishes water to irrigate lands which it has sold, the right to use the water shall remain a perpetual easement to such land, and that, when any person who is cultivating land on the line and within the flow of any ditch owned by such corporation has been furnished water by it, such person shall be entitled to the continued use of the water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Dec. Dig. ⇨253.]

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨247 — WATER COMPANIES — PRIVATE RIGHT — ENFORCEMENT.

The owner of a private right to be supplied with water for irrigation by a water company may sue to enforce such right, regardless of whether the water has been dedicated to a public use by the company.

4. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW ⇨208 — WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨216 — WATER COMPANIES—CLASS LEGISLATION.

In view of Const. art. 12, § 15, requiring foreign corporations doing business in the state to comply with its laws, Civ. Code, § 552, obligating water companies to continue furnishing water for irrigation, is not unconstitutional as class legislation, though it applies only to corporations organized under the laws of California.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-677; Dec. Dig. ⇨208; Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 305; Dec. Dig. ⇨216.]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⇨247—IRRIGATION—WATER RIGHT—PUBLIC USE—PETITION.

That a count of a petition apparently based on the theory that plaintiff was a beneficiary of a public use in water in control of defendant did not expressly state that the water was devoted to a public use, or that defendant was in charge of such public use, did not render it insufficient, where the facts alleged showed with sufficient certainty that the water was so dedicated and used.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 314; Dec. Dig. ⇨247.]

6. DEDICATION ⇨16 — WATER COMPANIES — IRRIGATION.

Where a corporation takes over a water plant owned by an individual obligated to furnish water to irrigate lots sold by him, no dedication of water to public use arises from this fact alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 15-49; Dec. Dig. ⇨16.]

7. DEDICATION ⇨13 — WATER COMPANIES — IRRIGATION — PRIVATE USE — CONVERSION INTO PUBLIC USE.

A corporation owning a water supply and engaged in distributing it to land for irrigation, pursuant to agreement, on a mere private use, may, with consent of the owners of the right to receive such water, change the use to a public one subject to regulation by public authority.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⇨13.]

8. DEDICATION ⇨16 — WATERS—IRRIGATION—PRIVATE USE — CONVERSION INTO PUBLIC USE.

Where a corporation engaged in furnishing water for irrigation in fulfillment of contracts giving a private use and 25 inhabitants and taxpayers of the county petitioned the board of supervisors, pursuant to Act March 12, 1885 (St. 1885, p. 95) § 3, to regulate the corporation's rates, and where, pursuant to such petition, an ordinance was duly passed fixing the rates, which ordinance remained in force for several years, and was complied with, the prior private use of the water was converted into a public use, entitling landowners to use water on payment of the rates so established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 15-49; Dec. Dig. ⇨16.]

9. DEDICATION ⇨38 — WATERS—RECONVERSION INTO PRIVATE USE.

Where a private use in water for irrigation was converted into a public use by act of the corporation amounting to a dedication thereof to public use, the corporation could not thereafter revoke the dedication and convert it back into a private use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 77, 78; Dec. Dig. ⇨38.]

10. DEDICATION ⇨16 — WATERS — PRIVATE USE—CONVERSION INTO PUBLIC USE.

That no resolution of the board of directors authorizing a petition by a water corporation to the county board of supervisors requesting them to regulate water rates appeared on the minute book of the corporation did not prevent the act of the corporation from constituting a converting of a private use into a public use, where the petition was signed by the secretary of the corporation, and its organizer and manager testified that steps were taken by it to have the rates established, and that it conformed to the rates thus established.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 15-49; Dec. Dig. ⇨16.]

11. APPEAL AND ERROR 1170—HARMLESS ERROR—CHANGE OF FORM OF PROCEEDING—AMENDMENT TO COMPLAINT.

While it was irregular to change a proceeding in mandamus under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1084, 1097, to compel defendant to deliver water to plaintiff's land on payment of the established rates to an action for equitable relief or for damages, by an amendment to the complaint, the allowance of such amendment was not ground for reversal, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 475, and Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring that nonprejudicial errors be disregarded, where the facts necessary to support the amendment were alleged in the original complaint, and the case was tried on the theory presented by the amendment, and it did not appear that defendant was prejudiced thereby.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by J. A. Andrew Franscioni against the Soledad Land & Water Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wallace M. Pence, of San Miguel, and F. P. Feliz, of Salinas, for appellant. Zabala & Bardin, of Salinas, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This appeal is from the judgment. It was taken within 60 days after entry thereof.

The complaint is in two counts. The first count, in brief, alleges that the plaintiff is the owner of 40 acres of land, being lots 5 and 6 of block 3 of a subdivision of lot 3 of the Rancho Ex-Mission Soledad, made by one McCray in 1895; that the defendant owns and operates a pumping plant established to obtain water to irrigate said subdivision, including the land of plaintiff; that the right to have water from said pumping plant of defendant delivered by the defendant to said lots, on his demand, for the irrigation thereof, upon payment by him of the established rates thereof, is an appurtenance to plaintiff's lots; that he has demanded the delivery of such water by the defendant, and offered payment of the rates; that the defendant refuses to deliver the water, except at higher rates and upon unwarranted conditions, and denies the plaintiff's right thereto, whereby the plaintiff has been damaged by the loss of crops from want of irrigation of the lots in a sum stated, for which he asks judgment. He also asks judgment that he be declared entitled to receive water from said plant on demand and payment of the established rates. The right of the plaintiff, as alleged in this count, is a private right granted to his predecessor in interest under certain agreements and deeds set forth in the complaint. It does not go upon the theory that the water of the defendant is devoted to public use, or that the plaintiff is a beneficiary of such use and as such entitled to the water. The second count, as we understand it, although it is not clear, is based upon the theory that the plaintiff, by reason of his ownership of said lots, is a beneficiary of a public use in the water in control of the defendant; that the defendant is in charge of such public use, and is bound to deliver water to the defendant for the irrigation of said lots, on his demand and payment of the established rates; and that the defendant refuses to do so, and denies that the plaintiff is a beneficiary of such public use, or that such public use exists, and denies that it is administering a public use, and asserts that it is conducting a private water system and serving private rights only.

[1] It is argued that the first count does not show that the right to receive the water claimed by the plaintiff from the defendant is a right appurtenant to said lots. We think it is sufficient in this respect. The defendant's predecessor in the ownership of the water plant, one Gould, was the owner of 1,675 acres of land, being the said lot 3 of Rancho Ex-Mission Soledad. He had purchased it under an agreement by which he was to develop the water, erect the pumping plant, subdivide the land into suitable farm lots, build ditches from the plant to the several lots for the purpose of carrying the water to each lot for its irrigation, and thereupon sell the lots to purchasers. The development of the water supply and the erection of the plant appears to have been an element of the consideration upon which he bought the land, and the supplying of the water to the lots for irrigation by him was evidently a part of the plan devised to enable him to make sales. In pursuance of this agreement he caused the land to be subdivided into lots, erected the pumping plant, made ditches therefrom leading to the several lots, and began the irrigation of the lots therefrom, including the lots of plaintiff. Thereafter, in 1898, he agreed to sell these two lots, with the appurtenances, to Kelly, plaintiff's immediate grantor, and in 1899, in compliance with the agreement, the same were conveyed to Kelly, with the appurtenances, the deed reserving to the grantor the right to maintain the ditches then in use to carry water to said lots and other lots in the subdivision and all rights of way thereon. In 1905 Kelly conveyed the lots, with the appurtenances, to the plaintiff. From the time of the sale to Kelly, in 1898, until the refusal of the defendant to deliver water, in December, 1910, water from said plant was regularly delivered to said lots on demand of the owner and used thereon for irrigation. It was delivered by Gould until June, 1899. The defendant corporation was formed at that time, and Gould conveyed to it all his property and rights in the water system, upon its agreement to carry out his obligations to the several purchasers of lots regarding the water due them. Thereafter the delivery was made by the defendant. When Gould began irrigating these lots from his water plant through the ditches built by him, and thereafter sold the lots with this irrigation system in operation, an easement appurtenant to the lots and a corresponding servitude upon the water system was created, whereby the purchaser and his successors in ownership became entitled to demand and receive from the water system a supply of water for the irrigation of the lot purchased, and the owner of the plant became bound to continue the supply so long as the source held out. It was an easement annexed to the land by use prior to and at the time of the sale thereof, and it passed with the conveyance of the land, first to Kelly, and then to the plaintiff. Farmer v. Ukiah Water Co., 56 Cal. 11; Smith v. Corbit, 116 Cal. 591, 48 Pac. 725.

[2] The plaintiff also became entitled to receive the water from the defendant by virtue of the provisions of section 552 of the Civil Code. That section is as follows:

"Whenever any corporation, organized under the laws of this state, furnishes water to irrigate lands which said corporation has sold, the right to the flow and use of said water is and shall remain a perpetual easement to the land so sold, at such rates and terms as may be established by said corporation in pursuance of law. And whenever any person who is cultivating land on the line and within the flow of any ditch owned by such corporation, has been furnished water by it, with which to irrigate his land, such person shall be entitled to the continued use of said water, upon the same terms as those who have purchased their land of the corporation."

Gould conveyed to the defendant the legal title to the plaintiff's lots before he executed his deed therefor to Kelly, and the defendant perfected Kelly's title shortly afterward by a conveyance thereof to him. Under either of the alternatives provided for by the aforesaid section, therefore, the plaintiff is entitled to the water from the defendant, upon payment of the agreed rates, or a reasonable rate, if none was agreed on. The several water rights thus vested in the respective lot owners within the irrigated tract would be separate and private rights pertaining to each lot respectively.

[3] The first count contains no allegation that the defendant or Gould had dedicated the water supply to public use, and it does not state facts from which such public use is necessarily implied. It is therefore to be construed as a cause of action to enforce a private right. Such methods for the private sale and distribution of water have often been recognized as valid by our decisions. Hildreth v. Montecito, etc., Co., 139 Cal. 29, 72 Pac. 395; Arroyo Ditch, etc., Co. v. Bequette, 149 Cal. 546, 87 Pac. 10, 9 Ann. Cas. 1141; Walnut Irr. Dist. v. Burke, 158 Cal. 170, 110 Pac. 518; Garrison v. North Pasadena, etc., Co., 163 Cal. 239, 124 Pac. 1009; Thayer v. California Dev. Co., 164 Cal. 129, 128 Pac. 21.

[4] We are satisfied that section 552 is constitutional. There is nothing in the claim that it is class legislation, because it applies only to domestic corporations. That difference alone might even justify the classification, but we need not so decide, for the Constitution itself requires foreign corporations doing business here to comply with our laws. Const. art. 12, § 15.

[5] The appellant contends that the second count does not show that the water is devoted to public use, or that the defendant is in charge of such public use. These propositions are not explicitly stated therein, but the facts alleged, if true, show with sufficient certainty that the water is so dedicated and used. The findings declare that all the allegations of this count are true so far as they relate to this subject. We need not set out the facts at length.

The court, in the judgment, declared that the defendant was a public service water company in charge of the administration of a public use of water of which plaintiff is a beneficiary, and that the plaintiff is entitled to water therefrom for the irrigation of his lots, upon payment of the rates established by law. The defendant claims that neither the findings nor the evidence support the proposition that the water is devoted to public use, or the proposition that the plaintiff is distributing such water in the character of a purveyor of a public use.

[6] If the system as first established by Gould had continued unchanged, there would have been no public use and the defendant, in selling and distributing the water, would not be a public service corporation, but would be merely engaged in selling water in fulfillment of private contracts with particular persons for the supply of water to specific parcels of land. There would be no general use, no dedication to public use, and no right to the use in any person except the persons owning the lots to which the right to the water had been annexed by the respective agreements. Thayer v. California Dev. Co., supra.

[7] But we perceive no substantial reason why a corporation owning a water supply and engaged in distributing it to persons to whose land it has agreed to deliver it for irrigation, upon a use which is private, and not public or general, may not, with the consent of the owners of the rights to receive such water, change the use from a private and particular use to a public use, so as to make the service and terms of delivery subject to regulation and control by public authority. We think this may lawfully be done, and that, when it is done, all the parties concerned and consenting thereto, including the corporation engaged in the distribution, will thereafter be bound to conform to such rates, rules, and regulations for the service as may be established by the public body thereunto duly authorized.

[8] The evidence shows that this change was made. In June, 1899, Gould and others formed the defendant corporation, and Gould at once transferred to it all his remaining interest in said 1,675-acre tract for the ir-gation of which the pumping plant was erected, and also all his interest in said irrigation system and works and in the contracts made by Gould with purchasers of lots, in consideration whereof the company undertook to carry on the pumping plant and irrigation system and perform the existing obligations of Gould relating to the land and water rights thereto belonging. This the company thereupon and thereafter proceeded to do. Gould was its manager. At the time of the transfer to the company the water rate fixed by the agreements was, so far as shown, $1.50 an acre for each irrigation. In August, 1899, at the instance of the defendant, steps were taken to have the company's water rates established by the board of supervisors of the county, as provided in the act of March 12, 1885 (Stats. 1885, p. 95). In pursuance of section 3 of that act, the defendant and 25 persons who were inhabitants and taxpayers of the county signed and filed with the board of supervisors a petition to have the board, to quote the language of the petition, "regulate and control the rates and compensation to be collected by the Soledad Land & Water Company, a corporation, whose works are located about two miles west of the town of Soledad, in said Monterey county, at which place said company has appropriated water for irrigation for sale, rental, and distribution of said water by said corporation." In pursuance of this petition, after due notice, an ordinance was duly passed by the board fixing the rates to be charged and rules of service to be observed by the defendant in the operation of its irrigation system. This ordinance has ever since remained in force. This statute applies only to persons and corporations engaged in the sale, rental, or distribution of water for public use. By applying for this regulation the defendant, in effect, admitted that it was a public service corporation, administering a public use, and that the water it pumped and distributed was dedicated to public use. It immediately conformed to the rates and rules so established, and continued to do so until December, 1905, a period of six years. It appears that the water plant and system was constructed and operated to obtain water for the irrigation of the 47 lots into which said tract of 1,675 acres was subdivided. The plaintiff and Kelly, his grantor, have acquiesced in this change in the character of the use and in the rates and rules established by the board. There is evidence tending to show that all the other owners of lots in said tract likewise acquiesced therein. The judgment herein is, of course, without force as to other lot owners, but the evidence of acquiescence supports the finding that defendant is supplying a public use, instead of the original private rights. There is also evidence that the defendant made sales of water occasionally, when it could be spared, for lands outside of the 1,675-acre tract. This evidence also aids the conclusion that the prior use, whatever its character, has been converted into a public use for the benefit of all the lands within said tract that are suitable for irrigation and under the flow of the ditches and in convenient distance therefrom, and that plaintiff is entitled to the use of the water on payment of the rates so established.

[9] There is evidence that in December, 1905, the defendant made and entered on its minutes a resolution purporting to fix rates and rules for the sale and delivery of its water different from those fixed by the board of supervisors; that thereafter it did not conform to the rates and rules of the board, and that in 1909 it again attempted to declare its own rates; also that in 1910 it changed its articles of incorporation so as to make them declare that it was organized for the purpose of supplying water "as a private corporation, and not as a public water company, for private use, and not for public use," and that its stockholders should have a preferred right to the water. The original articles declared that the company was formed to supply water and sell the same for irrigation. This would empower it to do this business for either a private use or a public use, at its option. It is claimed that by reason of its conduct it has changed its character, as well as the use, and is not bound to continue the service as for a public use. It is obvious that, if the water had become dedicated to public use in 1905, it was not within the power of the defendant, as purveyor or owner thereof, to revoke the dedication and convert it into a private use. This cannot be done in any case without the consent, express or implied, of all the beneficiaries of the use. Such consent was not shown. The point is settled by the decisions of this court in Leavitt v. Lasse. Irr. Co., 157 Cal. 89, 106 Pac. 404, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 213, and Fellows v. Los Angeles, 151 Cal. 64, 90 Pac. 137.

[10] The objection is made that it was not shown that the signing or filing of the petition to the board of supervisors was authorized by the defendant company. No resolution of the board of directors authorizing it appeared in its minute book. But the petition was signed by the secretary of the company in his official character as such, and the testimony of Gould, who was the organizer and at the time the manager of the company, was that "steps were taken by the company to have the board of supervisors establish rates for the sale, rental, and disposition of that water," and that when this was done the company conformed to the rates established by the supervisors. As before stated, this continued until 1905. We think this shows that the company authorized the signing and filing of the petition.

[11] The cause was tried upon an amended complaint. The original complaint stated the facts substantially as set forth in the amended complaint, but the prayer thereof was for a writ of mandate. It was, in effect, a proceeding in mandamus, under sections 1084 and 1097 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to compel the defendant to deliver water to plaintiff's land on payment of the established rates. An alternative writ of mandate was issued and served on the defendant. A demurrer to the complaint was thereafter sustained, and thereupon, on leave of court, the amended complaint was filed, changing the prayer so as to present an action to have it adjudged that plaintiff is entitled to receive water from the defendant from its plant, that defendant is in charge of a public use in the water for plaintiff's benefit, and for damages for the injury from its previous refusal to supply said water. The defendant objected to this change of the character of the case, and moved to strike the amended complaint from the files on the ground that it was a departure and stated an entirely new cause of action. We are of the opinion that, under our system of procedure, it is irregular to change a proceeding in mandamus to an action for equitable relief or for the recovery of damages by an amendment of the complaint. In this case, however, the facts necessary to support the prayer of the amended complaint were alleged in the original complaint. The case has been tried on the theory that it was an action for equitable relief and for damages, and not a special proceeding in mandamus. It does not appear, and it is not asserted, that the defendant was in any manner inconvenienced or hampered in the presentation of the evidence or in the conduct of the case by the change in its character. The difference in the relief sought is slight. Even in mandamus the plaintiff could have recovered the damages here asked. Code Civ. Proc. § 1095. The difference in the form of the action is technical in character, and we cannot perceive that the defendant has suffered substantial injury by the change, or by the conduct of the court below in permitting it. The error is therefore not good cause for reversing the judgment. Code Civ. Proc. § 475; Const. art. 6, § 4½.

The objection that the evidence does not support the judgment for damages is not well taken. We cannot enter into the question of the credibility of the witnesses. The values given by them to the crops of alfalfa which the evidence shows the land would have produced if defendant had supplied water when demanded, after deducting the cost of production, are sufficient to show the damages allowed.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. OXNAM. (Cr. 1921.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 20, 1915.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 48 — CRIMINAL RESPONSIBILITY—MENTAL CAPACITY.

Where a person committing an act criminal in nature had sufficient mental capacity to appreciate the character and quality of his act, knew and understood that it was a violation of another's rights and wrong in itself, and knew that it was prohibited by law and that its commission would entail punishment to himself, and could appreciate the possible and probable consequences, he is criminally responsible therefor, however mentally deficient he may otherwise have been.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 53-58; Dec. Dig. —48.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW — 570 — MENTAL CAPACITY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence in support of the plea of mental incapacity in a homicide case held insufficient to raise any reasonable doubt in defendant's favor.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 686 — REOPENING OF CASE—DISCRETION.

In a homicide case, the refusal to permit defendant, to reopen his case, to introduce evidence not different in character from that elicited from several witnesses relative to their observations of defendant's conduct as bearing on his mental capacity at various times from shortly after his birth to a few months before the homicide, was not an abuse of discretion, where the only difference suggested between this testimony and the proposed testimony was that the latter referred to a time later than that referred to by any previous testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1619, 1620, 1625, 1626; Dec. Dig. —686.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 686 — REOPENING OF CASE—DISCRETION.

Where it appears, on an application to reopen a criminal case to permit the introduction of further testimony, that the proposed testimony is of substantial importance to accused, the application should be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1619, 1620, 1625, 1626; Dec. Dig. —686.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW — 945 — NEW TRIAL—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

A new trial should be granted in a criminal case for newly discovered evidence only where such evidence renders a different result probable.

6. CRIMINAL LAW — 1156 — APPEAL—DENIAL OF NEW TRIAL — NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE.

The denial of a new trial, sought in a homicide case for newly discovered evidence relative to defendant's mental capacity, could not be disturbed in the absence of a clear abuse of discretion or a showing that such evidence would probably produce a different result on a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3067-3071; Dec. Dig. —1156.]

7. INFANTS — 68 — JUVENILE COURT ACT—JURISDICTION.

That the matter has not been submitted to the juvenile court, pursuant to the Juvenile Court Act (St. 1913, p. 1297) § 18, does not deprive the superior court of jurisdiction to try a defendant for murder, though it develops on the trial that he was under 18 years of age when the crime was committed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Infants, Cent. Dig. §§ 174, 175; Dec. Dig. —68.]

8. CRIMINAL LAW ⇨1033—APPEAL—OBJECTION BELOW—INVESTIGATION BY JUVENILE COURT.

On appeal in a homicide case, an objection that no opportunity had been afforded for investigation by the juvenile court, pursuant to the juvenile court act (St. 1913, p. 1285), could not be considered when not presented below.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2629, 2630; Dec. Dig. ⇨1033.]

9. INFANTS ⇨68—SUBMISSION TO JUVENILE COURT — SUGGESTION OF DEFENDANT—NECESSITY.

The mere fact, that evidence elicited on the trial of accused tended to show that he was under 18 years of age when the crime was committed, did not require that the superior court on its own motion, without any suggestion being made pursuant to Juvenile Court Act (St. 1913, p. 1297) § 18, cause an investigation to be made under such act.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Charles E. T. Oxnam was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

George A. Hooper, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robt. M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Appellant and one Glenn Witt were jointly informed against for the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed December 22, 1914. They were tried separately, and appellant was convicted of murder in the first degree and adjudged to suffer death. This is an appeal from such judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

The circumstances attendant upon the commission of the homicide are stated in the opinion of this court in People v. Witt, 148 Pac. 928. It appears that it was this appellant who actually shot and killed William M. Alexander, the deceased, while he (appellant) and Witt were in Alexander's home, which they had burglariously entered in the nighttime for the purpose of committing larceny therein. The sole defense was that appellant was "an imbecile, feeble-minded, mentally deficient, and without sufficient reasoning power to understand the nature of his acts."

[1] It is not claimed that the evidence was insufficient to sustain the verdict of the jury on the question of mental capacity. The sole test prescribed by the law in such cases has been stated so many times by this court that it is hardly necessary to restate it here. If appellant, as substantially stated by the trial court to the jury, had sufficient mental capacity to appreciate the character and quality of his act, knew and understood that it was a violation of the rights of another and in itself wrong, knew that it was prohibited by the laws of the land and that its commission would entail punishment and penalties upon himself, if he had the capacity thus to appreciate the character and comprehend the possible or probable consequence of his act, he is responsible to the law for the act and is to be judged accordingly, however deficient mentally he may otherwise have been.

[2] A review of the record satisfies us that, not only does the evidence elicited in the trial sufficiently support the verdict so far as this question is concerned, but also that no other verdict could properly have been rendered. The testimony of his witnesses covered the whole period of his life from infancy down to a very short time before the commission of the crime, at which time, according to the claims of his counsel, substantiated by certain evidence, he was between 17 and 18 years of age. A careful analysis of the mass of testimony given in support of the claims of mental incapacity when made in the light of the uncontradicted evidence as to the circumstances of the homicide, and the conduct of appellant in regard thereto shows to us no substantial basis for a conclusion that appellant was so mentally deficient that he was incapable of distinguishing between right and wrong with relation to the act with which he was charged. At best, the testimony relied on simply showed substantially that he was not normal mentally; that as a child he was morose, timid, and possessed of a violent temper; that he stole; that he was somewhat peculiar, was not bright, was backward in his studies, was deficient in memory, etc. While some of the witnesses testified that in their opinion he was of unsound mind, or insane, their reasons given were not such as to show the degree of insanity or want of mental capacity necessary under the law to exempt a person from responsibility, and some stated that, in saying they regarded him as of unsound mind, they meant that they did not consider him bright or mentally efficient. Some of the witnesses for appellant on this question freely admitted that they considered him capable of distinguishing between right and wrong with relation to such an act as that here involved, and we find no substantial testimony to the contrary. While Dr. Allen, who had examined appellant somewhat cursorily, said he was defective mentally and that he thought he was an "imbecile," he also testified that he would not pronounce him of unsound mind, and that he was not insane in the ordinary acceptance of the term. According to the uncontradicted evidence, appellant and his companion deliberately planned the commission of the burglary, went to the Alexander home in the nighttime for the purpose of executing their plan, appellant being armed with a pistol, effected entrance through a window which they opened, carefully removed their shoes to prevent detection, and proceeded with their contemplated work of appropriating such valuables as they could find. When discovered in the bedroom of deceased, appellant still persisted in an effort to accomplish the purpose of the entry, in the struggle that ensued shot the deceased, and finally fled and sought a place of concealment. When found with Witt in the room in which they had taken refuge, he at first sought to explain a wound received by him in the leg while in the house of deceased as one received elsewhere, but finally confessed his guilt of the charge here involved. His recollection of what took place on the night of the homicide was clear and explicit, and his account was substantially in accord with what was testified to by the other witnesses. It would be difficult indeed to reconcile the situation thus presented with any theory of mental incapacity on his part sufficient in degree to exempt him from responsibility under the law. As practically said before, the evidence introduced in support of the plea of mental incapacity was not, to our minds, of such a nature as to raise any serious doubt on the question.

Three points are made for reversal.

[3, 4] 1. It is contended that the trial court erred in refusing to allow defendant to reopen his defense after he had rested, for the purpose of calling and examining one additional witness in support of his claim of mental incapacity. The record shows simply this: The defense rested and a recess was taken. When court reconvened, defendant's attorney said he had been informed of one more witness, not even naming him, whose testimony would be very short. The judge inquired if the proposed testimony was anything different from what had already been given. Defendant's attorney said the witness was one covering a period later on, later than any period already covered, and that the testimony was somewhat different, not much, but covered a period after he left home. The judge said that he anticipated the witness would testify somewhat as the others. Defendant's attorney said that he had not talked with the witness. The judge said he thought the ground had been fully covered and directed the prosecution to proceed with the rebuttal.

While the matter of allowing a party to reopen his case is one committed to the discretion of a trial court, if it had been made to appear to the lower court that the proposed testimony was of any substantial importance to defendant, we should say that in the exercise of that discretion an opportunity should have been given him to introduce it, notwithstanding his previous announcement that he rested. But no such showing was made in the lower court, and there is nothing in the record to warrant an assumption that the testimony could have assisted defendant in the slightest degree. Confessedly the proposed evidence was not different in character from that elicited from a long line of witnesses who had testified as to their observations of defendant at various times from shortly after his birth to a short time, a few months at most, before the homicide. We have already referred to the character of this testimony. The only difference suggested between this testimony and the proposed testimony was that the latter referred to a time later than that referred to by any previous testimony. It would be most unreasonable to assume that it could possibly have affected the verdict.

[5, 6] 2. The motion for a new trial was based in part on the ground of newly discovered evidence relative to the mental capacity of the defendant. It is the established rule in this state that a new trial should be granted on this ground only where the newly discovered evidence is such as to render a different result probable, and it has been said that the question as to the effect upon the case of newly discovered evidence is from its nature peculiarly one that is addressed to the discretion of the trial court.

"Unless the appellate court can plainly see that this discretion has been abused, that the showing made was of such a character as to make it manifest that the case would or should result differently on a new trial in view of the newly discovered evidence, the order of the trial court refusing a new trial will not be disturbed." People v. Sing Yow, 145 Cal. 1, 78 Pac. 235.

The affidavit of the attorney for appellant filed in support of the motion was to the effect that he had information to the effect that a lady in San Diego, naming her, would testify that when a small child appellant had suffered a severe attack of brain fever. Evidence had been introduced on the trial to the effect that when a small child appellant was very ill and had convulsions. The attorney's affidavit further showed that other persons, naming them, would testify that as a boy appellant "was mentally deficient" and "not bright." It is clear that as to all this there was nothing on which any claim of abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court can properly be based. The other affidavits filed were: (1) One of Dr. Ernest Bryant Hoag, simply to the effect that he had on January 19 and 20, 1915, examined appellant, his examination covering some three hours, and that in his opinion, based on Johns Hopkins University revised Binet-Simon Intelligence Scale appellant has a mentality less than that of a normal child of ten years of age; (2) one of Dr. Charles W. Waddle, to the effect that he is head of the department of psychology and education of the California State Normal School, Los Angeles, holds the degree of Ph.D., and has had considerable experience in "mental testing," that he has tested defendant, using the Stanford revision of the Binet-Simon mental tests, and that he is convinced that defendant is feeble-minded and not morally accountable for his acts to any greater degree than a child of corresponding "mental age" may be; (3) one of William T. Root, Jr., to the effect that he is a member of the department of psychology and education in said normal school, that Dr. Grace M. Fernald and he examined defendant, and that in his opinion, using the Binet-Simon tests, defendant is of the "mental age" of eight years and that he would class him as a "low grade moron"; (4) two of Dr. Grace M. Fernald, psychologist at said normal school and the California State School for Girls at Whittier, having a Ph.D. degree, to the effect that she examined defendant on January 16, 1915, and found him to be a feeble-minded individual of the "moron type," grading eight years "mental age" by the Binet-Simon test, and that she does not consider him morally responsible for his acts any more than a child of eight years of age would be responsible; and (5) one of Dr. Thomas J. Orbison, a physician and surgeon, to the effect that he had examined the defendant by the Binet-Simon method or scale, and concludes therefrom that he is of the "mental age" of eight years, or "one year above the imbecile age," and that the Binet-Simon method is the most satisfactory method in use for determining the mental age of a person. All of the examinations of defendant on which these statements were based were made apparently after the trial. No satisfactory reason was shown by any of the affidavits presented on the motion for the failure to ascertain prior to the trial by such examinations as were had subsequent thereto, the matters stated in these affidavits. But, regardless of this, we are satisfied that we cannot properly hold, in the light of all the evidence given on the trial, that the showing made by the affidavits was such as to make it manifest that a different result would or should be reached on the question of defendant's mental capacity in view of the alleged newly discovered evidence. This being the situation, we are not warranted in reversing the order of the trial court denying the motion for a new trial.

[7] 3. There was evidence given on the trial by appellant's witnesses tending to show that his birth occurred in May, 1897, which would make him only 17 years and 7 months of age at the time of the commission of the crime with which he was charged, and only one month older at the time of his trial in the superior court. Apparently the only evidence to the contrary was the fact that he had represented himself as over 18 years of age some time before the crime when he applied for enlistment in the naval militia, and his appearance; it being testified that physically he appeared older than his real age. Basing his claim upon the assertion that the evidence on the trial was substantially without conflict on the question of age, appellant's counsel insists that the superior court was without jurisdiction to try and sentence appellant in view of the provisions of the act commonly known as the Juvenile Court Act, approved June 16, 1913 (Stats. 1913, p. 1285). In section 19 of that act it is provided that:

"No dependent or delinquent person under eighteen years of age shall be prosecuted for crime until the matter has first been submitted to the juvenile court by petition as herein provided, or by certificate of the lower court as provided in section sixteen (eighteen) hereof."

Within the meaning of said act, the words "delinquent person" include any person who violates any law of the state, or any ordinance of any town, etc., defining crime, and which involves moral turpitude. Section 4. It is assumed, although the record does not affirmatively so show, that the matter of this charge was never submitted to the juvenile court. Apparently no suggestion of the age of appellant as a basis for arresting the prosecution was ever made in the superior court, the evidence on that subject being elicited in the ordinary course of the trial as evidence bearing on the issues being tried by the jury. No request was made of the trial court relative to such matter either before the trial, on the trial or on the motion for new trial. There is no pretense that any suggestion of age was made to the committing magistrate. The claim of any irregularity in this behalf is made for the first time on this appeal, and is based solely on what the evidence given on the trial shows as to appellant's age.

Consideration of the provisions of the juvenile court law satisfies us that the provision relied on is not to be taken as affecting the jurisdiction of the superior court in any criminal prosecution. The design of the various provisions relative to investigation by the juvenile court of the cases of delinquent persons under the age of 18 years is, of course, to afford an opportunity for investigation of the case of any delinquent person by a judge of the superior court specially charged with such work, with a view to ascertain whether the delinquent person is a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the reformatory provisions of the act, rather than under the laws generally applicable to offenses. With this design in view, it is made the duty of judges, upon proper suggestion and upon the finding of certain facts, to do certain things. By section 18 of the act, whenever a deposition or complaint is filed in any court other than a superior court charging a person with crime, "and it shall be suggested to the judge, etc., that the person charged is under 18 years of age," it is made the duty of the judge to suspend all proceedings and examine into the question of age, and if, "from such examination, it shall appear to the satisfaction of said judge * * * that said person is under the age above specified," he shall certify the matter to the juvenile court, and "immediately thereupon all proceedings against the said person on said charge shall be suspended until said juvenile court shall issue its mandate * * * directing the court * * * to proceed." It will be observed from this that, even in the case of a proceeding in an inferior court, there is no want of jurisdiction implied as to persons who are in fact under 18 years of age, but simply a suspension of proceedings, when, upon "suggestion" to the judge that the delinquent is under that age, he has satisfied himself that the delinquent is under 18 years of age and has so certified to the juvenile court. There is nothing in the language used in this section to suggest the idea that, in the absence of any suggestion, inquiry, and determination by such judge, there is any want of jurisdiction to proceed under the general law relating to crimes, simply because it may subsequently be developed that the delinquent was in fact under 18 years of age. In fact, the language expressly requires the judge himself to be satisfied on the question of age before he certifies the matter to the juvenile court at all, and unquestionably it was contemplated that in the absence of any such determination by such judge and any proceeding in the juvenile court, the case should proceed in the ordinary way and that the order or judgment of the judge should be valid and immune from any collateral attack based on the juvenile court act. Section 19 of the act, at the end of which is the provision specially relied on here, provides for a proceeding in the juvenile court "whenever it is claimed that any person under the age of twenty-one years is a neglected, dependent or delinquent person"; the same to be commenced by the filing of a verified petition praying that such an adjudication be made. In said proceeding the court is authorized to make such order "as is meet in the premises," including, in the event that it determines that a delinquent minor is not a fit and proper subject to be dealt with under the reformatory provisions of the act, an order that the proceeding be dismissed and the delinquent "prosecuted under the general law." Then follows the provision specially relied on here. We regard this provision as in no way going to the jurisdiction of the superior court to proceed under the general law in the matter of any indictment or information filed therein charging a public offense.

[8] It is certainly clear that no claim based on this provision of the act can be maintained in an appellate court after conviction and judgment under the general law, where no claim under the act was made prior to the appeal, and there has never been any investigation and determination as to the age of the offender. Such is the situation here, according to the record, if we assume in accord with defendant's theory that his case was never presented to the juvenile court. The age of defendant was not an issue tried and determined in the superior court by either the judge presiding or by the jury, was not even suggested to the trial judge for trial and determination, and we have no finding thereon. In other words, we have no judicial determination at all that the defendant was, in fact, under 18 years of age, and the proceedings in the superior court did not call for any determination on that question. In the absence of such a trial and determination on the question of age, we have no warrant for dealing with this case as subject to the provisions of the juvenile court act upon the assumption that defendant was in fact under 18 years of age, however much evidence as to that matter elicited on the trial from defendant's witnesses may indicate such to be the situation. Nor can it be held in view of the circumstances of this case as shown by the record and already detailed that there was any error committed by the superior court in this matter.

[9] As we have said, action of that court looking to investigation under the juvenile court act upon the theory that defendant was under 18 years of age was never invoked or even suggested, and, whatever might have been the duty of the court in the event of such a suggestion or request—a matter which it is not necessary here to consider—we are satisfied that the mere fact that certain evidence elicited on the trial of a defendant for a crime tended to show that he is under 18 years of age does not require the superior court to take any such action on its own motion.

We find nothing in the record warranting a reversal.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Thomas Briles against A. J. Paulson. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cornish & Robnett, of Alturas, for appellant. W. Lair Thompson, of Lakeview, Or., and Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The plaintiff brought this action to obtain a decree declaring that the rights of the defendant under a certain written contract were terminated. The contract was executed by the plaintiff and one J. J. Payseur. The defendant, Paulson, is the assignee and successor in interest of Payseur.

By the terms of the contract, which was dated December 5, 1910, Briles, in consideration of a payment of $100, granted to Payseur the option of purchasing certain lands in Modoc county for $17,000, at any time up to December 31, 1915. Payseur was to have a subdivision of the land made, and prices aggregating $17,000 were then to be put upon the various parcels; such parcels to be subject to separate purchase at the prices thus fixed. Payseur, if he exercised his option to purchase all or any of the land, was to pay one-fourth of the price in cash, and the balance in installments as provided in the agreement. Payseur was given the right to make sales to third parties; he to receive all of the purchase price above the sums (aggregating $17,000) which were to go to plaintiff.

By the agreement the second party (Payseur) "agrees that he will raise the dam upon the reservoir situated upon the aforesaid lands to a height of 25 feet, and will construct the same of substantial width and of sufficient solidity to withstand water pressure so that the water contained in said reservoir shall not be liable to burst therefrom; said reservoir to be completed on or before November 1, 1911." There was a further provision that if the party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, should fail, neglect, or refuse to carry out and perform each and every agreement contracted to be performed by him, the party of the first part (Briles) might, at his option, declare the agreement terminated and annulled, except as to parcels already contracted to be sold.

In June, 1911, Payseur assigned the contract to the defendant, Paulson, and on October 5, 1911, Briles and Paulson executed a writing modifying the clause of the main contract relative to work on the dam. By the modification it was provided that Paulson should, on or before November 20, 1911, widen the dam "15 feet, and raise said dam, when thus widened, 4 feet higher than present dam."

On March 22, 1912, the plaintiff served on the defendant a notice that he elected to terminate and annul the contract of December 5, 1910, because of the failure of the defendant to comply with his agreement (as modified) to raise and widen the dam by November 20, 1911.

The complaint set up the foregoing facts, and alleged that defendant had not widened the dam more than 8 feet, or raised it to a height greater on the average than 2 feet.

The prayer was for judgment that plaintiff was the owner of the land, that the contract be declared terminated, and that it be surrendered for cancellation. The defendant, in his answer, asserted that he had fully performed, but prayed that, if it should be found that his attempted performance was imperfect, he be allowed a reasonable time to complete the same. The findings of the court were in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment followed as prayed by the complaint. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] It is urged that the evidence does not support the finding that defendant had not widened the dam more than 8 feet, nor raised it more than 2 feet. But the argument made in this behalf is evidently based upon the notion that this court may weigh opposing testimony, and determine that the statements made by the defendant's witnesses, rather than those of the witnesses for plaintiff, should have been given credence. Such determination cannot, of course, be made by an appellate court. Where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, the finding of the court below must be sustained here. Without question the record in this case discloses such substantial conflict.

[2] The only other point made by appellant is that, even though there had been a failure to do the required work within the time limited, his rights under the contract should not have been forfeited outright, but he should have been allowed a reasonable time to complete performance. It is argued that, since equity abhors forfeitures, the defendant should be relieved from the effect of his failure to perform within the stipulated time. The provision regarding time was not, it is claimed, of the essence. Whatever force this argument might have if the agreement had been one binding the plaintiff to sell and the defendant, or his assignor, to buy, it certainly can have no application to the contract which was, in fact, made. That contract created a mere option, under which the defendant had the privilege of buying (but was not bound to buy), within a certain time, "subject to the conditions herein contained." One of the conditions was that he should do certain work on the dam before a given date, and another was that, if he failed to perform this, or any other thing agreed by him to be done, the plaintiff might terminate the contract. The defendant could not convert the option into an agreement of sale binding upon the plaintiff, except by complying with the conditions upon which the plaintiff had agreed to sell. Richardson v. Hardwick, 106 U. S. 254, 1 Sup. Ct. 213, 27 L. Ed. 145; White v. Bank of Hanford, 148 Cal. 552, 83 Pac. 698.

"Acceptance must be made and conditions performed within the time, if any, limited by the option, in order to constitute a contract of sale; time being of the essence in such contracts. 39 Cyc. 1241, and cases cited.

A court of equity would not be justified in relieving a party from the effect of his failure to comply with the conditions on which he had been granted the privilege of buying. This would be making a new contract for the parties, and compelling the owner to sell when he had not agreed to do so.

"The assent or act of acceptance," as the court said in Steele v. Bond, 32 Minn. 14, 21, 18 N.W. 830, "whether by payment or the fulfillment of some other condition, was necessarily to be made within the time limited; otherwise no contract could be consummated. * * * Equity cannot vary the terms of such a stipulation by an extension of the privilege. The time limited for acceptance or payment is, in such case, part of the contract or option, and equity cannot interfere, unless in cases where its jurisdiction can be properly invoked on the ground of fraud or mistake, which is not alleged here."

The judgment is affirmed.

DIBBLE v. RELIANCE LIFE INS. CO. OF PITTSBURG, PA. (S. F. 6449.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 15, 1915.
Rehearing Denied June 14, 1915.)

1. INSURANCE ⇨400—LIFE INSURANCE—STIPULATIONS—VALIDITY.

An incontestable clause in a life policy issued to a trusted employé of insurer is as binding on insurer as if the policy had been issued to a stranger, for the parties sustain the same relation as in the ordinary case of life insurance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1086; Dec. Dig. ⇨400.]

2. INSURANCE ⇨400—LIFE INSURANCE—INCONTESTABLE CLAUSE—APPLICABILITY.

A provision in a life policy that it shall not be contested after one year from its date, except for nonpayment of premiums, prevents insurer from contesting the policy after one year, on the ground that insured, when applying for insurance and at all times thereafter, was seriously ill, though the policy also provides that it shall not take effect until the premium is paid, while insured is in good health, and the policy shall have been duly issued.

3. PLEADING ⇨264—AMENDMENTS—EFFECT.

An amended answer supersedes the original answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 803-805; Dec. Dig. ⇨264.]

4. PLEADING ⇨93—DEFENSES—INCONSISTENT DEFENSES—RIGHT TO PLEAD.

Inconsistent defenses may be separately pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 189, 190; Dec. Dig. ⇨93.]

5. INSURANCE ⇨400—LIFE INSURANCE—INCONTESTABLE CLAUSE—EFFECT.

A provision in a life policy that it shall be incontestable after one year from its date, except for nonpayment of premiums, precludes any defense after the stipulated period on account of false statements warranted by insured to be true, though the statements were fraudulently made, unless fraud is expressly or impliedly excepted from the effect of the provision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1086; Dec. Dig. ⇨400.]

6. INSURANCE ⇨400—LIFE INSURANCE—INCONTESTABLE CLAUSE—VALIDITY—"ALL CONTRACTS."

Civ. Code, § 1688, providing that "all contracts" which have for their object the exemption of any one from responsibility for his own fraud are against the policy of the law, includes life insurance policies, but does not render invalid a clause declaring that a policy shall be incontestable after one year from its date, though construed to preclude the defense of fraud by insured, for the object of the clause is only to provide a shorter term for maintaining a claim on the ground of fraud than is prescribed by limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1086; Dec. Dig. ⇨400.]

7. INSURANCE ⇨400—LIFE INSURANCE—INCONTESTABLE CLAUSE—CONSTRUCTION.

A provision in a life policy that it shall be incontestable after one year from its date, except for nonpayment of premiums and except as otherwise provided in the policy, does not expressly or impliedly except an action or defense based on fraud by insured, though the policy provides that, in the absence of fraud, all statements in the application shall be deemed representations and not warranties, and no such statement shall avoid the policy unless contained in the written application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1086; Dec. Dig. ⇨400.]

8. INSURANCE ⇨640—LIFE INSURANCE—ACTION—DEFENSES.

A count, in an answer in an action on a life policy which denies the issuance of the policy in consideration of an annual premium, is good as against a demurrer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1554, 1609-1612, 1614-1624; Dec. Dig. ⇨640.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Mae Dibble against the Reliance Life Insurance Company of Pittsburg, Pa. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

J. C. Campbell, Walter Shelton, and David L. Levy, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Lovett K. Fraser, Casper A. Ornbaun, and Ornbaun & Fraser, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This case was ordered retransferred to this court for hearing and determination, by reason of the inability of the justices of the District Court of Appeal of the Third District to concur in a judgment. While the cause was pending in the last-named court Mr. Justice Burnett prepared an opinion, which was forwarded to this court, as required by the Constitution. That opinion is as follows:

"One of the main points in this controversy growing out of an action for the recovery of a $5,000 life insurance involves the construction of the following provision in the policy: 'Incontestability—This policy and the application therefor, a copy of which is hereto attached, constitute the entire contract between the parties and shall be incontestable after one year from its date, except for nonpayment of premiums and except as otherwise provided in this policy. All statements made by the insured in said application shall, in the absence of fraud, be deemed representations and not warranties, and no such statement shall avoid the policy unless it is contained in the written application hereof, a copy of which application is hereto attached.' As a general rule, no doubt, effect will be given to such stipulation and if the time prescribed be reasonable the insurance company will be precluded from urging any defense, including fraud, to an action on the policy if said defense be covered by said agreement. In 25 Cyc. 873, it is stated as follows: 'A clause, now often inserted in policies, that after being in force a specified time they shall not be disputed or shall be incontestable, precludes any defense after the stipulated period on account of false statements which were warranted to be true, even though they were made fraudulently.'

"A great many cases are cited in support of the text, those of which relating to the defense of fraud we will notice specifically.

"In Massachusetts Benefit Life Association v. Robinson [104 Ga. 256] 30 S. E. 918, 42 L. R. A. 261, the Supreme Court of Georgia said: 'As the law may prescribe such a limitation in which actions shall be brought by the party to be affected, it is also within the power of the contracting parties to agree among themselves upon a period of time which would amount to a statute of limitations, either greater or less than the period fixed by the law. * * * Parties interested in the contract may waive the benefit of the statute of limitations fixed by the law, the effect of the waiver being either to make a longer or shorter period than the law prescribes. What is said above would seem, however, to be subject to the qualification that where the effect of the contract would be to vitalize, by the lapse of time fixed in the contract, an undertaking which would otherwise be void for fraud, the time fixed in which the party would have a right to rescind the contract on account of the fraud must be such a time as by the exercise of ordinary diligence the same could have been discovered. * * * Where parties enter into a contract which from its nature affords an opportunity to one party to perpetrate a fraud upon another, and it is stipulated therein that the party who is liable to be defrauded shall have a specified time in which to make inquiry as to the acts and conduct of the other party, he is on notice, by the very terms of the contract itself, that fraud may be involved in it, and the duty is upon him to commence at once an investigation into the acts, conduct, and representations of the other party; and if the time fixed is such that the information which would show that the fraud had been perpetrated could have been, by the exercise of ordinary diligence, obtained, then the parties are bound by their contract as to time, and after the lapse of that time fraud is no longer a defense. This does not violate in any way the well-settled principle that fraud is to be abhorred, vitiates everything it touches, and the person guilty of it is not to be countenanced in any way by the courts. While all this is true, it is equally well settled that a contract which has for its foundation a willful fraud may become vitalized and enforceable by the negligence of the party who was the victim of the fraud.' And, in considering some other clauses that seemed not to be covered by the noncontestable provision, the court reaffirmed the familiar doctrine that where a policy is fairly susceptible of two different constructions the one more favorable to the insured will be adopted. The court held that those things which were declared to be acts which would vitiate the policy could be made effectual as a defense only if asserted within the said three-year period.

"In Reagan v. Union Mutual Life Insurance Co., 189 Mass. 555, 76 N. E. 217 [2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 821, 109 Am. St. Rep. 659, 4 Ann. Cas. 362] the clause in controversy was, 'This policy is incontestable from date of issue for any cause, except nonpayment of premium.' In holding that this did not preclude the defense of fraud, the court said: 'This is not like the numerous cases in which the policy provides that it shall be incontestable for fraud after the expiration of a specified time, which is not unreasonably short. It has often been held that a provision of that kind is valid because it is in the nature of a limitation of the time within which the defendant may avoid the policy for this cause. Such a provision is reasonable and proper, as it gives the insured a guaranty against possible expensive litigation to defeat his claim after the lapse of many years, and at the same time gives the company time and an opportunity for investigation, to ascertain whether the contract should remain in force. It is not against public policy, as tending to put fraud on a par with honesty' (citing a large number of cases).

"In Murray v. State Mutual Life Ins. Co. [22 R. I. 524] 48 Atl. 800 [53 L. R. A. 742], deceased's policy had been issued two years and all premiums paid, and it contained a stipulation that it should be incontestable after two years from the date of its issue, provided the premiums were paid as agreed. It was held, by the Supreme Court of Rhode Island, that the contention that the defendant company was entitled to plead that the insured made false and fraudulent answers in his application, in bar of an action on the policy, because the incontestability clause was void as condoning fraud, and as against public policy, cannot be sustained, since the clause merely imposed a reasonable limitation on the time in which fraud could be established.

"In Union Cent. Life Ins. Co. v. Fox [106 Tenn. 347] 61 S. W. 62 [82 Am. St. Rep. 885], the Supreme Court of Tennessee could see no force in the declared distinction between policies which are by their terms to become at once incontestable and those to become incontestable only after a certain length of time, and the court declares that: 'If the time may be limited to one year within which the defense of fraud may be made available, it is difficult to see why it may not be limited to six months or one month or such other time less than this as the company may deem it important to stipulate.' The court further held that before the policy is issued the company has abundant opportunity to investigate concerning the representations of the insured, and that it may bind itself not to contest the claim after the contract is executed even upon the ground of fraud.

"As to the defense that the insured falsely represented the state of his health, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin, in Patterson v. National Premium Mut. L. Ins. Co. [100 Wis. 118] 75 N. W. 980 [42 L. R. A. 253, 69 Am. St. Rep. 899] said: 'Besides, the incontestable clause would seem to effectually bar this defense. If this clause be not altogether a glittering generality, put in for no purpose except to induce men to insure, it would seem that it must cover such misstatements or omissions as are here alleged. Such clauses have been upheld by various courts.

* * * We see no reason why an insurance company may not take the risk of ascertaining for itself the condition of health of the insured.'

"The only cases cited holding that a clause providing that the policy shall be incontestable from date is void as against the defense of fraud are Reagan v. Union Mutual Life Ins. Co., supra, and Welch v. Union Cent. L. Ins. Co., 108 Iowa, 224 [78 N. W. 853] 50 L. R. A. 774.

"In the latter it is held that 'a provision in an insurance policy that it shall be incontestable for any cause except misstatement of age "except as hereinbefore provided" will not preclude the insurers from relying on the warranties contained in the application, which is part of the contract and the statements in which are made the basis of the policy, and that the omission of fraud from the specified grounds of contest will not preclude contest on that ground.'

"It may be added that the subject is thoroughly considered in the note to Clement v. New York Life Insurance Co., as reported in 42 L. R. A. 247, and I think the statement is justified that all the recent cases and authorities hold that where a reasonable time is given for investigation, an incontestable clause is valid as against all defenses not excepted from its operation.

"And in this connection it may be said that I can find no warrant for the assertion that by the terms of the policy here fraud is withdrawn from the application of said provision.

"There is no contention that fraud is expressly excepted and I think there is no such implication. As I understand it, the clause in which the term is used simply implies that in case of fraud the statements made in the application shall be deemed warranties, but there is nothing to suggest that a defense on said ground is not barred by the lapse of the time period prescribed.

[1] "Nor can I see that the legal aspect of the situation is changed by the circumstance that the insured was a trusted employé of the company. As far as the policy itself is concerned, the parties sustained the same relation as in the ordinary case of life insurance. The company would certainly have the right to grant to its employés the same favor as to strangers, and it should be bound by the same obligations. Indeed, as far as opportunity for inquiry and investigation to ascertain fraud is involved in the question, there is reason for holding the insurer to a stricter accountability where an employé is the insured.

"A more serious question is presented by the consideration of section 1668 of the Civil Code, providing as follows: 'All contracts which have for their object, directly or indirectly, to exempt any one from responsibility for his own fraud * * * are against the policy of the law.' It is not disputed that it is within the province of the Legislature to declare such principle of public policy, and that it should be enforced. It is claimed, however, that the section has no application to insurance policies, but I find no warrant for this contention. 'All contracts' certainly include contracts of insurance, but I am inclined to the view that, properly speaking, it was not the object of the parties to said insurance policy to exempt the insured from the consequences of his fraud, but the object and effect of said incontestable clause was simply to provide a shorter term for maintaining said claim than is prescribed by the statute of limitations. In other words, in my opinion, by said section the Legislature did not intend to condemn a contract that in the interest of repose and security would fix a reasonable limit for the time in which such defense might be successfully urged, but the intention was to preclude a contract that would altogether relieve either party of the consequences of his own fraud.

[2] "There is another consideration which is worthy of serious attention. It was agreed by the parties that the contract of insurance 'shall not take effect until the first premium shall have been actually paid, while I am in good health, and the policy shall have been signed by the duly authorized officers of the company and issued.' It is urged by appellant, therefore, that these three circumstances, the payment of the first premium, the condition of good health on the part of the insured and the execution of the policy by the company, were conditions precedent to the existence of any contract whatever, and that since in the answer and cross-complaint it appears that the insured, when he made the application and at all times thereafter, was not in good health, but seriously ill, for this reason the demurrer should have been overruled. It is said by appellant that, in Gallant v. Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. [167 Mass. 79] 44 N. E. 1073: 'There was a provision in a purported life insurance contract that no obligation was to be assumed by the company unless the insured was in good health at the date of the policy. It appeared that the insured was in poor health at that date, and the court held that there was no contract, and the company was not liable. This was followed in Barker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. [188 Mass. 542] 74 N. E. 945, in regard to a similar state of facts.' Other cases also to the same point are Volker v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. [1 Misc. Rep. 374] 21 N. Y. Supp. 456; Carmichael v. John Hancock Life Ins. Co. [116 App. Div. 291] 101 N. Y. Supp. 602; Dwight v. Ins. Co. [103 N. Y. 341] 8 N. E. 654, 57 Am. Rep. 729; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Howle [62 Ohio St. 204] 56 N. E. 908; and Packard v. Ins. Co. [72 N. H. 1] 54 Atl. 287.

"It is to be observed, however, that in none of these cases was there an incontestable clause, and this circumstance is claimed by respondent to be a vital distinguishing fact. In support of the contention she cites Mohr v. Prudential Ins. Co. of America [32 R. I. 177] 78 Atl. 554; Mutual Reserve Fund Assoc. v. Austin, 142 Fed. 398 [73 C. C. A. 498, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1064]; and Commercial Life Insurance Co. v. McGinnis [50 Ind. App. 630] 97 N. E. 1018.

"In the first of these it was said: 'The defendant does not dispute that a period of more than one year had elapsed between the date of the policies and the death of the insured. The defendant contends, however, that the policies must have had a legal inception in order to sustain an action thereon, and that before the plaintiff could claim the benefit of the incontestable clause she must show that all the conditions precedent to the issuance of the policies have been complied with. To this contention it should be said that the policies were issued and were delivered; that the premiums due upon said policies were received by the defendant up to the time of the death of the insured; that the policies were treated by the insured and the defendant as subsisting contracts between them. The policies upon their face purport an obligation on the part of the defendant. To an action to enforce this apparent obligation the defendant interposes the defense that the insured was not in good health at the time of the delivery of the policies. Upon this ground the defendant is contesting its liability under the policy. Such a contest is within the scope of that clause which makes the policy incontestable after one year from its date if all due premiums shall have been paid, without by its terms excluding any ground of defense. To hold otherwise would be to permit such a clause in its unqualified form to remain in a policy as a deceptive inducement to the insured.'

"In the Austin Case it was held by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals, First Circuit, that as far as the incontestable clause is concerned, there is no distinction between the condition precedent as to the delivery of the policy while in good health and statements in the application which were made warranties, and that unless expressly excluded they were all covered by the agreement not to contest the policy. In the note to this case, as reported in 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1064, it is said: 'The contention of the defendant in this case that the incontestable clause was an agreement conditioned upon the insurance having been in force, and that the insurance was not in force because the assured was not in good health when the policy was delivered to him, does not seem to have been thought of before, as an extensive search has failed to discover any case where such a defense was relied on. The reasoning of the court, however, seems impregnable in spite of the lack of authority upon that specific question, and its position is still further strengthened by a decision of the North Carolina Supreme Court in Grier v. Mutual L. Ins. Co., 132 N. C. 542, 44 S. E. 28.

"The McGinnis Case, supra, was to the same effect, there being a clause in the policy that it was not to go into effect unless the first premium was actually paid during the lifetime and good health of the insured, but it was held that this was covered by the incontestable clause, and that the insurer had waived its right to urge such defense.

"The other cases cited by appellant in this connection do not relate to life insurance, nor do they involve any consideration of an agreement not to contest the action, and therefore, of course, they are clearly distinguishable.

"While there is persuasive force in appellant's reasoning, I am content to follow the authorities upholding respondent's position, there being no case in point to the contrary, and therefore must resolve this contention in favor of plaintiff.

"For the foregoing reasons I conclude that the cross-complaint of defendant, seeking a cancellation and annulment of said insurance policy, is insufficient in its statement of facts, and that the demurrer thereto was properly sustained.

"The amended answer, however, contains this averment: 'Defendant denies that on the 2d day of August, 1910, or at any other time or at all at San Francisco, Cal., or at any place, or at all, in consideration of the payment of the premium of $64.30 annually during five years, or for any consideration whatever, defendant by its agents duly authorized, or at all, executed its policy of insurance No. 29,268 in writing to one Robert M. Dibble on his life for the term of five years, or any other time, in the sum of $5,000, or any other sum, or any policy whatever.' There is thus specifically denied one of the vital allegations of the complaint and thereby a material issue is presented.

[3, 4] "It is of no importance as a matter of pleading that no such denial was contained in the first answer, or that said denial is inconsistent with the allegations of the separate defense and also of the cross-complaint. The original was superseded by the amended answer, and inconsistent defenses may be separately pleaded.

"I think, therefore, that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the first defense set forth in the amended answer. The said denial may result in no practical benefit to appellant, but, nevertheless, it must be considered apart from the other defenses.

"It would seem to follow that the judgment should be reversed, with directions to the court below to overrule the demurrer to the first count of the answer."

[5] It is stated in the foregoing opinion that "there is no contention that fraud is expressly excepted" from the effect of the incontestability provision. In this respect, as is pointed out by counsel for appellant, the learned justice was in error, as the claim was expressly made in their briefs. With this minor exception, going in no way to the merits of the appeal, we are satisfied that the opinion is in all respects correct, including, of course, the view expressed to the effect that there is no good warrant in fact for the assertion that by the terms of the policy, fraud is withdrawn from the application of the incontestability provision, and we adopt such opinion as a part of the opinion of this court.

[6] As is shown by this opinion, the decisions in other states are practically unanimous in holding that a provision in a life insurance policy, to the effect that, after being in force the specified time, it shall be incontestable, precludes any defense after the stipulated period on account of false statements warranted to be true, even though such statements were fraudulently made, unless by the terms of the policy fraud is expressly or impliedly excepted from the effect of such provision. Learned counsel for appellant do not appear to dispute this, but earnestly claim that section 1668, Civil Code, necessitates a different ruling in this state. We cannot so read the section, and entirely agree with what is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice Burnett in regard thereto. The answer to the claim is the same that has uniformly been made by the courts of other states, to the claim that the well-settled principle that "fraud vitiates everything it touches, and the person guilty of it is not to be countenanced in any way by the courts" voids such a provision as one against public policy. The opinion contains expressions from other courts on this subject. To these may, with propriety, be added the views of the Court of Appeal of New York, expressed in Wright v. Mutual Benefit Association, 118 N. Y. 237, 23 N. E. 186, 6 L. R. A. 731, 16 Am. St. Rep. 749, as follows:

"It is not a stipulation absolute to waive all defenses and to condone fraud. On the contrary, it recognizes fraud and all other defenses, but it provides ample time and opportunity within which they may be, but beyond which they may not be, established. It is in the nature of and serves a similar purpose as statutes of limitations and repose, the wisdom of which is apparent to all reasonable minds. It is exemplified in the statute giving a certain period after the discovery of a fraud in which to apply for redress on account of it and in the law requiring prompt application after its discovery, if one would be relieved from a contract infected with fraud. The parties to a contract may provide for a shorter limitation * * * than that fixed by law and such an agreement is in accord with the policy of statutes of that character."

[7] The incontestability provision cannot be reasonably construed, in our opinion, as either expressly or impliedly excepting an action or defense based on fraud. The entire provision, as we read it, so far as applicable here, is that:

"This policy * * * shall be incontestable after one year from its date, except for nonpayment of premium and except as otherwise provided in this policy."

The language immediately following on which appellant relies, while bearing upon the question of the liability of the insurance company under the policy, obviously has reference to an entirely different matter from that referred to in the preceding sentence. It simply provides that, in the absence of fraud, all statements in the application shall be deemed representations and not warranties, and no such statement shall avoid the policy unless contained in the written application. As substantially said in Mr. Justice Burnett's opinion, there is nothing herein to suggest that a defense on the ground of fraudulent statements will not be barred by the lapse of the time prescribed in the preceding provision. See, in this connection, Clement v. Insurance Co., 101 Tenn. 22, 30, 46 S. W. 561, 42 L. R. A. 247, 70 Am. St. Rep. 650. Referring to the words in the first sentence "except as otherwise provided in this policy," we find no provision in the policy otherwise providing as to a false statement in the application, unless perhaps the provision under the same heading of "Incontestability" that "If the age of the insured has been misstated, the amount payable hereunder shall be such as the premium paid would have purchased at the correct age" is such a provision. It should be borne in mind, in construing these provisions of the policy, that under well-settled rules all doubts or ambiguities must be resolved against the insurance company.

As to the other points made by defendant, there is no necessity for adding anything to what is said in the opinion of Mr. Justice Burnett.

[8] For the reasons stated in that opinion, we see no escape from the conclusion that the demurrer, while properly sustained as to the further and separate answer and defense, and to the cross-complaint, should have been overruled as to the first count of the answer, in view of the specific denial therein of the execution of the policy. It should perhaps be said, in justice to the learned judge of the lower court, that it is extremely probable that the existence of this denial was not specifically urged on the argument in the lower court. It is true that the denial may result in no practical benefit to defendant, but, of course, it is impossible for us to know what evidence may be obtainable by defendant on the issue thus clearly made. Defendant was certainly entitled to an opportunity to present its proofs on this issue, in view of the condition of the pleadings, and as each defense must be considered separate and apart from all other defenses, no court can hold in advance of a trial that, given such an opportunity, defendant could not show that the policy was not, in fact, ever executed.

The judgment of reversal to be given shall not be taken as affecting the order of the trial court sustaining the demurrers in so far as the further answer and the cross-complaint of defendant are concerned.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the lower court to overrule the demurrer of plaintiff in so far as the first count of the answer is concerned.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by E. P. Chrissinger against the Southern Pacific Company and another. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ben F. Geis and Duard F. Geis, both of Willows, for appellant. Frank Freeman, of Willows, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff was injured by a north-bound limited train of the defendant corporation while he was crossing the main track of that company's railroad at Willows. Defendant Riley was the engineer of the train which struck plaintiff. In his action for damages after all of the testimony in plaintiff's behalf had been heard the court sustained a motion for nonsuit, and judgment was given accordingly. From the said judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

[1] There was a conflict of evidence upon the subject of warning blasts of the whistle, but for the purposes of this discussion it must be assumed that the engineer neither sounded the whistle nor caused the bell to be rung. The evidence shows without conflict that the train was moving at a rate of speed of approximately 20 miles an hour. But the fact that the usual precautions were omitted and the defendants were negligent does not require a reversal of the judgment and order if the other circumstances indicate, as matter of law, that from the most favorable view of the facts the court must have concluded that plaintiff's own negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. Holmes v. Co., 167 Cal. 204, 138 Pac. 1005.

The accident occurred at the intersection of Sycamore street with the railroad tracks, one of the principal crossings from the main portion to the eastern section of the town of Willows. The train which injured plaintiff was proceeding from the south, and he was crossing the main line from the west for the purpose of posting a letter on the mail car of the limited train, which had arrived from the north and was standing on a side track east of the main line. The mail car was in Sycamore street. The railroad station is south of Sycamore street, or rather its northern end projects about four feet upon the southerly part of that street; the station being on the west side of the railroad tracks.

At the place where the accident occurred there are four tracks. The first of these nearest to the station is designated as the "house track," the second is the main line, and the two others are side tracks. The west side of the house track is 12.5 feet from the east line of the station. The distance between the house track and the main track is 26 feet from center to center, and as the width of each track is from 4.8 feet to 4.9 feet, this would leave a space of a little more than 21 feet between the tracks. The sidewalk north of the depot on Sycamore street is 12 feet wide. Extending from the freight shed of the station almost to the house track is a platform for unloading freight. It is about the height of the floor of a freight car. From the north line of the depot to the steps that lead to this platform is 56.5 feet. Sycamore street is 80 feet wide. The side track on which the south-bound train was standing was 14 feet to the east of the main line.

[2, 3] The accident occurred about 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Mr. Chrissinger, a man 39 years of age, in perfect health, with normal faculties of sight and hearing, rode on his bicycle to the curb near the north end of the station. He jumped off the bicycle and left it against the curb. When he reached the northeast corner of the depot he stopped. "When I got off my wheel," he testified, "I looked for an approaching train that might be coming. I looked both ways, and I saw no train other than the one that was standing there. I did not hear any train. I did not hear the whistle of any train, nor did I hear any bell. Then I stopped and looked both ways to see if I could see any train; then I started in the direction of the mail car; then I again stopped and looked to see if any train was coming and I did not see any train. I then started again for the mail car and I hadn't quite reached the mail car until the other train came and struck me. There was no noise of the train or any indication of the train coming. I never knew it was there until it was right onto me. I knew as soon as I struck the ground where I was. There was a string of box cars loading at the platform that came up almost to the door, and besides that there was two or three baggage trucks, loaded with trunks and sample cases that obstructed the view to the south. I couldn't see beyond the trucks at all. I was 50 or 70 feet north of the trucks. The train that struck me neither whistled nor rang a bell." Witness also said that he was 20 or 25 feet north of the south line of Sycamore street, northeast of the station when the accident occurred. The direction taken by him from the time he dismounted from the bicycle until he was struck was northeast. The baggage trucks, so plaintiff testified, were halfway between the house track and the main line track. Each was 3½ feet wide by 10 or 12 feet long. They were loaded with baggage so that it was 6 or 7 feet from the ground to the top of each load. Mr. Chrissinger is 5 feet 9 inches in height. He testified that in his opinion a car or engine is about 12 feet in height from the ground. The baggage trucks were north of the box cars at the loading platform, the north end of the northerly truck being about even with the door of the waiting room, which is about 22 feet from the north end of the station. Mr. Corbett, another witness, located these trucks at about the same place in which plaintiff said they were situated. He said: "These trucks were standing end to end lengthwise of the track north and south." The plaintiff gave another estimate of the locations of the two trucks, stating that one of them stood quartering, the northeast corner of it being a little in front of the box car and the southwest corner perhaps a foot or a foot and a half from the east rail of the house track, while of the other truck he testified:

"Truck No. 2 was almost all of it east of truck No. 1. I cannot tell you at all whether two-thirds or three-fourths of it or all of it was east of truck No. 1. I can't tell exactly the situation now. I have given it as well as I know how."

Continuing, he said:

"When I got to the house track I stopped and looked around, like I usually do when crossing the railroad. I couldn't say the exact place, or whether I had got past the house track, was about the time I crossed that track, then I looked again. Q. The box car was still in your way? A. Yes, sir. Q. And the trucks were still in your way? A. Yes, sir. Q. You could not see anything, then? A. No, sir."

We will not discuss the testimony of the other witnesses, as the plaintiff's own version of the accident was quite as favorable to his side of the case as that of any other witness.

The evidence fully justified the court's action in granting the motion for nonsuit. When plaintiff stopped at the northeast corner of the depot, looking south he could see the box cars, and the baggage trucks "and a little farther off the engine of the other train." When he had crossed the "house track" on his way to the mail car he saw the same things. As the engine of the south-bound train was south of the box cars and trucks and east of the main line, either he could look over the trucks or between the trucks and the box cars to the engine on the side track. If the trucks were standing in front of and north of the box cars they did not obstruct his view because he saw the engine of the south-bound train over them. If they were located "about the middle of the space between the first and second tracks" or, as witness Corbett said, "about six feet west of the main line, standing parallel with the track," then he had a clear view of the main line between the box cars and the trucks, and as the track was straight he might have seen an approaching train for a distance of many hundreds of feet. If the trucks were located partly in front of the box cars near the house track he had ample space between them and the main track to observe the approaching engine if he had looked. Respondents' counsel argues that, assuming the trucks with their loads to be 7 feet high, the engine of the north-bound train 12 feet high (these are plaintiff's own figures) and plaintiff's eyes 5 feet 5 inches from the ground (he being 5 feet 9 inches in height), and placing plaintiff 40 feet from the trucks, he could have seen the engine 166 feet away as he looked over the top of the trucks, at 50 feet he could have seen the engine 208 feet away, and at 60 feet he could have seen it 291 feet away. We think these deductions are not only logical, but inevitable from the testimony in the case, if we assume that the trucks would be directly in line between plaintiff and the north-bound train. In any view of the testimony we are forced to conclude that had plaintiff used the slightest care the accident would not have happened. True it is that we have his own statement that he looked and listened, but did not see or hear the approaching train, but where, as here, the established facts and conditions make it plain that by looking and listening he must have observed the approach of the train, his testimony that he looked and listened, but did not see or hear, is not enough to support a verdict in his favor. Zibbell v. Southern Pacific Co., 160 Cal. 241, 116 Pac. 513.

[4] A person approaching a railway track, which is itself a warning of danger, must take advantage of every reasonable opportunity to look and listen.

[5] Undoubtedly the question of contributory negligence or freedom from it is ordinarily one for the jury, but where, as here, the standard of conduct is so obvious as to be applicable to all persons, and the plaintiff has failed to measure up to that standard under the circumstances shown, he is not entitled to have his case go to the jury. Hamlin v. Pacific Electric Co., 150 Cal. 779, 89 Pac. 1109.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Welborn, Judge.

Action by F. K. Hoffman against the Guy M. Rush Company. From judgment for plaintiff and denial of new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Walter L. Bowers, of Los Angeles, for appellant. John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Appeal by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

There was no abuse of discretion by the superior court in refusing a continuance of the trial after denying the defendant's motion for nonsuit. The only witness proposed for defendant was not present. No subpoena had been served upon this witness, and on the showing made the court had legal authority to proceed without delay.

[1] The findings were signed by the judge without any preliminary service upon defendant of proposed findings. Assuming, without deciding, that the new provisions of section 634, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1913, are more than directory, nevertheless the service of proposed findings was not required in this case, since the record does not show that the court gave any direction that findings be prepared by the plaintiff.

[2] The defendant corporation is a broker engaged in selling real property for commissions. The plaintiff's demand for which judgment has been entered was for compensation for services rendered to defendant in the course of its business. These services consisted in exhibiting to prospective purchasers real property which afterwards was sold by defendant to those purchasers. The complaint alleged that the defendant became indebted to the plaintiff for these services in a specified sum, which sum it was alleged that defendant agreed to pay. It is now contended that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings, and particularly it is urged that there is no evidence to show any agreement made or indebtedness contracted by defendant.

The evidence is all contained in the plaintiff's testimony, including therewith certain papers identified by him. From this evidence it appears that Guy M. Rush, president of the corporation, at the office thereof, told the plaintiff that he did not want any salesmen, but wanted men to go out and advertise for him and solicit prospective buyers, and that he would pay a specified per cent. for people that they would sell to that plaintiff might get as prospects. He introduced the plaintiff to the sales manager, and the plaintiff went to work. Plaintiff showed property to a number of persons to whom sales were made. Mr. Rush kept a book in which reports of sales were set forth, and this book was made accessible to the plaintiff by direction of the president.

[3] As president of the corporation, if he was only that and nothing more, it may be conceded that Mr. Rush was without authority to bind the corporation by the contract pleaded in the complaint. Pacific Bank v. Stone, 121 Cal. 202, 53 Pac. 634. But the president of a corporation like the defendant, if he is also its general manager, would be acting within the scope of his authority in employing an agent such as the plaintiff and agreeing for the corporation as to payment for such services. "It is conceded law that in order to bind a corporation by his acts it is not necessary that any resolution should be passed appointing a general manager. It will be sufficient if it be shown that he was manager de facto." Brown v. Crown Gold Milling Co., 150 Cal. 376, 386, 89 Pac. 86, 91. The evidence to which we have referred tended to prove that Guy M. Rush was the actual general manager of the defendant's business, and that on behalf of the corporation he employed the plaintiff. This evidence is not contradicted and is sufficient to sustain the finding in question.

The evidence is also sufficient to sustain the finding as to the amount due. The testimony was introduced in a very informal manner, and the witness gave as facts the results of his computations as to the amounts of the several commissions earned; for instance, he would say that the amount of his commission on a certain sale was so many dollars, and did not state the price at which the property was sold. But he had stated the percentages which he was to receive, and no objection was made to either questions or answers.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Where a city charter dealing with the adoption of ordinances by initiative, used the singular "ordinance," and an initiative petition set forth an ordinance as an entirety and two alternative provisions, the petition could not be treated as containing three distinct ordinances, the last two being void, and thereby compel the submission to the voters of only the first ordinance, for the inclusion in the petition of the void alternative propositions rendered the entire petition void, there being no duty enjoined on the city council or clerk to eliminate the void portions and submit the balance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Application for writ of mandate by Elbert R. Bennett against T. W. Drullard and others, the City Council and City Clerk of the City of Santa Cruz, to compel the submission to the electors of the city of a proposed ordinance. From a judgment denying relief, petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph Smith, of Santa Cruz, for appellant. J. Leslie Johnston, of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment of the superior court of the county of Santa Cruz, denying the application of the appellant for a writ of mandate, directed to the city council and city clerk of the city of Santa Cruz, commanding them to submit a certain initiative ordinance to the electors of said city, to be voted upon by them at the next municipal election.

The ordinance referred to in the petition relates and purports to make unlawful the sale of alcoholic liquor in said city. Accompanying this proposed ordinance, which consists of several sections, and embraced in the same initiative petition, are two alternative propositions purporting to make certain changes in the form and effect of sections 6 and 7 of the main ordinance, and which the petitioners also seek to have submitted and voted upon at said election. The appellant's application for a writ of mandate to compel the submission of said initiative ordinance and of said alternative propositions was denied by the superior court, and, in the opinion of this court, was properly denied for the reasons which were set forth by the judge of said court in a written opinion accompanying the order denying the same, which opinion is hereby approved and adopted as the opinion of this court, and which reads as follows:

"On March 4, 1915, under the initiative provisions of the freeholders' charter of the city of Santa Cruz a certain petition was presented to and filed with the city clerk of said city, containing proposed legislation to be submitted to the electors of said city at the coming general municipal election on May 4, 1915. The city council and city clerk refuse to allow said proposed legislation to be placed upon the ballots. The petitioner now seeks to compel such action by mandamus.

"The initiative petition in question, after the preamble thereof, sets forth an ordinance in its entirety. The first section of the ordinance prohibits the sale of liquors, the keeping of any establishment for the sale thereof, or the taking of any orders therefor within the city of Santa Cruz. Section 2 enumerates certain exceptions. The sixth exemption is the keeping of liquors on the premises where manufactured, but the same must be sold and delivered outside of the city. The remaining sections of the ordinance pertain to matters incidental to its enforcement. Then follows what is designated as 'Alternative Proposition No. 1,' in the following words: 'You are also requested' and required to submit, to the electors of the city of Santa Cruz at said next general municipal election the question of the adoption of an alternative proposition herein-after stated; that said alternative proposition shall, if approved by a vote of the qualified electors at said election, be submitted for and take the place of paragraph 6 of section 2 of said ordinance; and said alternative proposition shall be submitted to the voters for their approval or rejection in the following form: 'Shall the alternative proposition designated as paragraph 6 of section 2, providing for the sale and delivery of alcoholic liquor by manufacturing establishments take the place of paragraph 6 of section 2 as set forth in the body of the ordinance?'

"Said alternative proposition is as follows: The substance of alternative proposition No. 1 is to exempt the sale of liquors in the city by the manufacturers thereof in quantities of not less than two gallons, and if delivered at the permanent residence of the person so purchasing. Following this is alternative proposition No. 2, with the request substantially in the same wording as the request preceding alternative proposition No. 1, and the substance of alternative proposition No. 2 is to exempt the sale of liquors in hotels and restaurants. The political reasons urged for and against the adoption of the ordinance and the alternative propositions then follow, and thereafter follow the certificate of the elector and the jurat of the notary.

"It is conceded that the initiative petition has a sufficient number of signatures attached to it, but the refusal of the city authorities to place the same upon the ballot is based upon the following grounds: (1) That the ordinance therein set forth has no title. (2) That in said ordinance it is provided that the same shall not take effect until October 1, 1915, which respondents claim is in conflict with the charter provisions, which provide that initiative measures shall, if carried, go into effect as a valid and binding ordinance 10 days after the official count shall have been determined. (3) That said initiative petition contains matters, to wit, two so-called 'alternative propositions,' which render the whole petition void.

"The objection last above stated is the serious one, and the court will confine its decision to such point alone. The first question arising thereunder is whether or not the two alternative propositions are void, that is, are they in their present form authorized by law to be submitted under the initiative? Counsel for petitioner concedes that there is no provision of law authorizing the submission of such propositions, and he further concedes that they are probably void. There is no doubt of it in the mind of the court, and the same being void neither can go upon the ballot. But it is now claimed that said alternative propositions are in fact ordinances distinct in themselves, and that the initiative petition should be treated as containing three ordinances instead of one, and the last two being void, that the respondents should disregard them as being surplusage, and submit to the voters the part of the petition which might be valid. To allow this to be done would be to establish a precedent, first, that in one initiative petition may be contained several ordinances, even though they might be contradictory to each other; and, secondly, that before submitting to the people the legislation petition for, whether it is one or more ordinances, the municipal authorities must pass upon the petition for its illegal parts, and if in their opinion parts of it are void, that they should eliminate such parts and submit what is left to the voters.

[1, 2] The answer to all of these questions depends almost entirely upon the provisions of the city charter. It is agreed by the parties to this proceeding that the charter is a grant of the powers and not a limitation, so that no act can be legally exercised thereunder unless such act finds express authority in the charter itself, or is implied from some of its express terms. There can be no doubt of this rule. McQuillin on Municipal Corporations, vol. 1, p. 783, announced the rule as follows: 'A corporation being a mere creature of law, possesses only those properties which the charter confers upon it, either expressly or as incidental to its very existence.' The author further states: 'As relates to the exercise of powers it is generally regarded that corporations have none of the elements of sovereignty; that they cannot go beyond the powers granted them, and that they must exercise such granted powers in a reasonable manner. These are legal propositions which cannot be disputed.'

"On the first point, that is, the claim that an initiative petition may contain more than one ordinance, no provision of the city charter to that effect has been shown to the court, and after a somewhat exhaustive search the court has been unable to find any. On the contrary, in every section throughout the article of the charter dealing with the initiative the singular, 'ordinance,' is used, and there is nothing contained in said sections which gives the slightest encouragement to the claim of petitioner. But it makes no difference, so far as this court can see, whether said alternative propositions had a legal or an illegal place in the initiative petition, because it is conceded, or virtually so, that in their present form they are void. Now the question is: Is there any duty specially enjoined upon the respondents to segregate the parts that are void from the parts that would otherwise be valid, and submit the valid parts to the voters? Indeed, have the respondents any lawful right at all to change the initiative petition in any manner whatsoever? This court believes that for both moral and legal reasons such duty or privilege does not exist.

"Here is a power granted unto the people, to propose their own laws for adoption, provided certain legal procedure be followed to properly place said laws before the voters. Assume, if you please, that certain features are included in such proposed laws or in connection therewith, which appealed to the voter, and in fact served as the controlling influence inducing him to sign the petition. Has he not the right to assume, and should not the law protect him in the assumption, that he will have the opportunity and right to vote for the matters which he has petitioned for? Or, shall the law permit the alteration of the measures which he has proposed and petitioned for, to the extent that he will be unable to recognize the same when he comes to cast his ballot? In fact, is not the whole theory of initiative legislation based upon the security that the legislation proposed and petitioned for by the people shall be voted upon at the polls by them without interference, revision, or mutilation by any official or set of officials? If the scheme of revision of initiative measures by city authorities be correct, as claimed by counsel for the petitioner, where is it going to end? It will undoubtedly result in a premium on fraud, because it will permit unscrupulous persons to secure signatures under false representations and pretenses, based upon matters incorporated in the petition, and it will give to city officials power to raise real or imaginary legal defects in laws about to be submitted to the people, and permit them to alter the same at will. If they have the right to eliminate any part of the proposed law contained in the petition, they also undoubtedly have the right to add to, change or revise them in any particular, and their ideas of the legality of such measures or parts of measures may be right or may be wrong, and they may be honest or they may be dishonest. Where is the limitation to be?"

"The court does not wish to be understood as saying that there has been the slightest misrepresentation or fraud in connection with the initiative petition under consideration. On the contrary, it believes that the utmost good faith and honesty of purpose have actuated every phase in connection therewith; but it desires to point out the dangerous precedent that will be established if it holds that initiative petitions can be altered in any manner after the same have been filed with the municipal authorities. It might be said, as claimed by the petitioner, that while the city officials have the power to eliminate a part of an initiative petition, which part is not an integral part of the ordinance therein set forth, or to strike therefrom a second or third ordinance, on the ground of the invalidity thereof, that they would have no power to alter the integral part of a complete ordinance therein set forth. But the answer to this is that whether they strike out a part of the petition, or make an amendment by revision, elimination or insertion, to a complete ordinance therein set forth, the people will thereafter vote on something that was not petitioned for, and therefore the result is exactly the same.

"In the present case the electors petitioned for and believed that they were going to have placed before the people measures by the terms of which the liquor traffic of the city of Santa Cruz would be regulated in a certain specified manner; and now, because certain parts of the petition are void, it is claimed that the municipality must place before the voters the remaining portion of the petition, which consists of an ordinance which would, if carried, regulate the liquor traffic in an entirely different way. To permit this would, in the opinion of the court, be manifestly unjust and unfair.

"Counsel for the petitioner has rightfully called to the court's attention the fact that the petition of hundreds of voters should not, except for strong legal reasons, be set aside. The court has been guided by this feeling throughout its consideration of these proceedings, and it feels that, were it to grant the writ as prayed for, it would be doing exactly that which counsel for the petitioner has requested the court not to do, because, were it to adopt any other conclusion than the one reached and hereinabove expressed, it would be directing something to be placed on the ballot which the hundreds of voters did not petition for at all, and it would necessarily follow that the court would be doing an unfair and an unjust act toward them.

"If the municipal authorities have the right to alter an initiative petition at all, as claimed by petitioner, they would have the authority, if they felt so inclined, after striking out the alternative propositions mentioned, to insert an amendment in the remaining original ordinance, whereby such ordinance would be given an entirely different character from the one they desired to have placed before the voters, and one which has not been petitioned for at all. Would counsel for petitioner then say that such action on the part of the municipal authorities would be legal or fair? And yet the principle involved is to all intents the same. That it was the intention of the framers of the charter to prevent any change being made in initiative petitions after they were filed with the municipal authorities, is conclusively shown by the provision in the charter which absolutely forbids it in the following words: 'It [the council] must either adopt or enact such measure without alteration, or submit the same to the electorate.'

"Initiated legislation is practically of recent origin, and there have been but few Supreme Court decisions rendered upon it. Therefore, in its consideration of the question here involved the court has had no opportunity to be guided by court precedents; but in the absence of such it has tried to base its decision upon its own ideas of the principles of justice and fairness. As above stated, the whole theory of direct legislation, as the court understands it, is that the people have the right to propose their own laws, and to vote upon them as proposed, without having the same altered in any manner whatever by any person or persons whomsoever. * * *

"The court's conclusions are: (1) That the so-called alternative propositions are void. (2) That their inclusion in the petition renders the entire petition void. (3) That there is no duty specially enjoined by law upon the council or the city clerk to eliminate the parts of the petition that are void and submit to the electorate the remainder of the petition. (4) That the council and the city clerk have no authority whatever to alter the petition."

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is affirmed.

STOCK et al. v. THIELE. (Civ. 1455.)

CONTRACTS $\Leftrightarrow$ 319—BUILDING CONTRACT—DESTRUCTION DURING WORK.

Where a building contract required the owner to pay the contractor 75 per cent. of the contract price as the work progressed and 25 per cent. 35 days after the completion of the work, and provided that in case the work should be destroyed by earthquake the loss should be sustained by the owner to the extent that he had paid installments thereon or that might be due, and by the contractor for the uncompleted portion of the work on which he might be engaged at the time of the loss and for which no payment was yet due, the contractor was entitled to payment for 75 per cent. of the contract price of the work done by him from day to day, and in case of loss by earthquake could recover only 75 per cent. of the value up to that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 1458, 1476, 1477, 1479, 1493-1507; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 319.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by Frank Stock and another against F. C. Thiele. Judgment for the plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. M. Fickert, of San Francisco, for appellant. H. E. Wilcox and D. M. Burnett, of San Jose, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal by the defendant from an order denying his motion for a new trial in an action brought by the plaintiffs in the form of the common count for labor performed and materials furnished, and in which the plaintiffs recovered judgment.

It will be necessary for us to pass upon but one of the points discussed in the briefs. The plaintiffs, being copartners, by a written contract with the defendant, undertook to do the plumbing work on a certain building in Palo Alto, and were engaged upon said work when the building was destroyed by an earthquake, and the question for determination is as to whether or not, under the terms of the contract, they are entitled to recover a judgment against the defendant for the full value of the work already done at the time of said destruction, or only the proportion thereof for which payment was at that time due. The answer to this question depends upon the construction to be given to clauses 5 and 12 of the contract. Those clauses read as follows:

"(5) The owner agrees to pay to the contractor the sum of $3,495 at the time and in the manner following, to wit: Seventy-five per cent. of said $3,495 as the work progresses; twenty-five per cent. of the said $3,495 thirty-five days after acceptance of the work."

"(12) In case said work herein provided for should, before completion, be wholly destroyed by earthquake or other acts of God, then the loss occasioned thereby shall be sustained by the owner to the extent that he has paid installments thereon, or that may be due under the fifth clause of this contract, and the loss occasioned thereby, and to be sustained by the contractor, shall be for the uncompleted portion of said work upon which he may be engaged at the time of the loss and for which no payment is yet due under said fifth clause of this contract."

While the contract contained no provision for specific periodical payments, no doubt payments were made as the building progressed, although under the terms of the contract the plaintiffs were entitled to be paid 75 per cent. of the value of the work performed as fast as it progressed and from day to day. A contract identically like this one was before this court in the case of Hettinger v. Thiele, 15 Cal. App. 1, 113 Pac. 121, and the court, referring to the paragraph here under review, said:

"It was intended that as the work was performed by the contractor he should be entitled to 75 per cent. of the value of the work so performed, measured by the contract price; that is, for example, when the contractor had placed materials and labor in the building in accordance with the plans and specifications of the value of $1,000, he should be entitled to a payment of $750, and so on from time to time. As the work progressed, and as fast as it progressed and from day to day, the contractor was entitled to 75 per cent. of its value. Of course, it would have been unreasonable for the contractor to have claimed and demanded the amount due from day to day, and insisted upon the architect giving him a certificate from day to day as to the amount that had become due. It must be presumed that the parties intended the contract to be reasonably construed, and that with such view the contractor would only require payment to be made at reasonable intervals as the work progressed, so as to enable him to pay for his materials, and to pay the wages of carpenters and artisans employed by him. In fact, this must have been the course pursued, because no question appears to have been made as to the payment of installments up to the time of the earthquake, which payments amounted to $8,800. The twelfth clause of the contract makes provision for loss in case the building should be wholly destroyed by earthquake. * * * The provision as to the loss shows that in case the building should before completion be wholly destroyed, the parties intended that the owner should lose all payments that he had made to the contractor and all the sums that had become due under the contract. On the other hand, the contractor was to lose all sums that had not become due for the uncompleted portions of the work."

According to testimony offered on behalf of the plaintiffs, there was $2,021.25 worth of work completed under the contract at the time of the destruction of the building, which would leave the plaintiffs, under the fifth and twelfth clauses of the contract, 75 per cent. of that amount, or $1,515.94, and deducting the sum of $1,500, which plaintiffs admit the defendant has paid on account of the work, the former are entitled not, as they claim, to $515.94, but to $15.94.

The specification of the particulars wherein the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision are amply sufficient. Nor is there any substantial merit in the attempted distinction between this case and the case above quoted from—which perhaps is the reason that the point here raised was not made in that case.

LEAVELL v. SUPERIOR COURT OF PLACER COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1383.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 19, 1915.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨174—TRIAL DE NOVO—DEMURRER—RIGHT TO ANSWER AFTER OVERRULING OF DEMURRER.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 472, providing that, when the demurrer to a complaint is overruled, and there is no answer filed, the court may upon such terms as may be just allow an answer to be filed, a superior court may deny defendant the privilege of answering after his demurrer has been overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 665-693; Dec. Dig. ⇨174.]

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE ⇨188—JUDGMENT—CONFORMITY TO PLEADINGS—FAILURE TO DISPOSE OF ISSUE OF LAW.

On an appeal to the superior court from a justice court, an amended complaint was filed to which a demurrer and a motion to strike was interposed, which came on regularly for hearing and were submitted. The court filed a decision making no mention of the demurrer or motion, but reciting that no reason was apparent why the contract sued on should not be enforced, and directing that judgment be entered in conformity with the prayer of the complaint, and judgment was entered for plaintiff for the amount sued for. Held that, if it was the intention of the court to overrule the demurrer and deny defendant the privilege of filing an answer, such intention should have been expressed in the order, and, there being nothing to show any disposition of the issue raised by the demurrer or motion, the judgment should be annulled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 721-725, 733; Dec. Dig. ⇨188.]

3. PLEADING ⇨222—DEMURRER—RIGHT TO ANSWER AFTER OVERRULING OF DEMURRER.

Where, after a demurrer and a motion to strike are overruled, defendant asks leave to file an answer, and the court has reason to believe that he is acting in good faith, permission to file an answer ought to be granted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 570-574; Dec. Dig. ⇨222.]

Action by the Placer County Growers' Canning Association against Louis L. Leavell. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant brings mandamus to compel its setting aside. Judgment annulled.

Hughes & Bradford, C. B. Harris, and Harry J. Gray, all of Sacramento, for petitioner. W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and A. E. Clark, of Lincoln, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. An action was originally commenced in the justice court of No. 10 township in Placer county by the Placer County Growers' Canning Association against said Leavell to recover the amount of one call or installment alleged to be due upon a subscription to said association's capital stock, and plaintiff therein recovered judgment for the sum of $50. Thereafter said defendant appealed to the superior court of said county upon questions of both law and fact. Afterward, by permission of said court, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint. To this a demurrer was interposed, and also a motion to strike out portions of said complaint. The record shows that the demurrer and motion to strike out came on regularly for hearing on April 16, 1914, and were ordered submitted on briefs. The briefs were filed, and on July 21st following the court filed its decision, which, as far as is in point, was as follows:

"No reason is apparent why the contract subscribed by the defendant should not be enforced according to its terms. The contract is plain, distinct, lawful, and in every way enforceable according to its import. Let judgment be entered in conformity with the prayer of the complaint."

On the same day the judgment was entered as follows:

"In accordance with and by virtue of an order made by this court in the above-entitled action on the 21st day of July, 1914, it is hereby ordered and adjudged that plaintiff, Placer County Growers' Canning Association, do have and recover of and from defendant, Louis L. Leavell, the sum of $50, together with plaintiff's costs and disbursements," etc.

It is the contention of petitioner that respondent had no authority to render judgment on the merits without having disposed of the demurrer. It is not disputed that the demurrer presented an issue of law which it was the duty of the court to determine, and that the adjudication of that issue was a jurisdictional prerequisite to the determination of the cause upon its merits. It is, however, the claim of respondent that the order made by the court was, in effect, an order overruling the demurrer and denying defendant permission to answer, and therefore within its jurisdiction.

[1] That a superior court has legal authority to deny a defendant the privilege to file an answer after he has interposed a demurrer, and it has been overruled, cannot be disputed. Section 472 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"When the demurrer to a complaint is overruled and there is no answer filed, the court may, upon such terms as may be just, allow an answer to be filed."

In Borland v. Thornton, 12 Cal. 440, the court below overruled a demurrer to the complaint, and on proof made rendered judgment in favor of plaintiff, and appellant contended on appeal that he should have been allowed to put in an answer. The Supreme Court, however, Judge Field rendering the opinion, said:

"The reply to the objection is found in the statute" [quoting the corresponding section of the Practice Act]. "The allowance rests in the discretion of the court below, subject to review, of course, in case of its arbitrary or unreasonable exercise."

[2] The trouble here is, though, that said order is entirely silent as to the demurrer.

No reference is made to it, and, although we may suspect that it was the intention of the learned trial judge to overrule said demurrer and withhold from defendant the privilege of filing an answer, such intention, if it existed, should have been expressed, we think, in the formal order. We can, of course, consider only the record as presented, and we look in vain for any mandatory disposition of said issue of law. To hold that the language used was sufficient for the purpose would be to encourage an unwarranted invasion of the right of litigants to demand reasonable certainty in judicial proceedings to the end that prescribed methods of redress may not be obscured or destroyed, and that complete justice may be effected. It is, of course, no answer to say that the result would have been the same if the court had expressly overruled the demurrer and directed the default of defendant. The question is not what the final result would be, but, rather, whether the court has followed the steps required by the law in reaching that result.

While no case directly in point has been called to our attention, Null v. Superior Court, 4 Cal. App. 207, 87 Pac. 392, and Kraker v. Superior Court, 15 Cal. App. 651, 115 Pac. 663, are instructive as to the general principle involved. In the former it was held that:

"The superior court has no jurisdiction to try a case de novo on appeal from the justice court, where no issues of fact have been tried in the justice's court. If the only question presented is one of law as to the jurisdiction of the justice's court, it is the duty of the superior court to affirm or reverse the decision, and, if reversed, to remand the case for trial upon the issues of fact; and, where it has improperly tried such an appeal de novo and rendered judgment thereon, its judgment will be annulled upon certiorari if it is not made to appear that the judgment rendered was voluntarily paid by the defendant."

In the latter case it was held that:

"Where a judgment rendered in the justice's court against the defendant was appealed by the defendant to the superior court on questions of law and fact, the dismissal of the appeal for want of prosecution by the appellant and the rendition of the judgment appealed from in favor of the respondent without trial, was in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court, and its action will be annulled on certiorari."

[3] The conclusion we have reached leaves the cause pending in the trial court with the demurrer and motion to strike out undisposed of. If the decision as to these should be against defendant, no doubt the court will carefully consider the propriety of permitting him to file his answer; which, it appears, he sought leave to present after said judgment was rendered against him. If the court has reason to believe that he is acting in good faith, such permission, of course, ought to be granted, that the cause may be fully tried upon its merits.

We think the said judgment should be annulled; and it is so ordered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Henry C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by the D. H. and M. A. Edwards Company against W. P. Barry and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant United Surety Company appeals. Affirmed.

Henry A. Jacobs, of San Francisco, for appellant. Marshall Nuckolls, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant and appellant United Surety Company, a corporation. The facts, which are mainly undisputed, are briefly these: One W. P. Barry entered into a contract with plaintiff to construct a certain building in the city and county of San Francisco, for which he was to be paid the sum of $8,400 in installments as the work proceeded according to the terms of his contract. Barry began the work of constructing the building, but after he had proceeded with such work for some time, and had received payments in accordance with the contract aggregating the sum of $4,500, he abandoned the construction of the building, and formally notified the plaintiff thereof by letter. Thereupon the plaintiff and the representative of the surety company held several conferences, as the result of which the latter wrote the plaintiff a letter reciting the fact of Barry's abandonment of his contract, waiving its right under its bond to assume said contract and complete said building, and consenting and agreeing that the plaintiff might proceed to complete the structure, and in so doing expend such reasonable sums as were necessary according to the plans and specifications, and no more. The United Surety Company also in this letter agreed to allow the plaintiff the sum of $500 for its services in completing the building, and for the services of its attorney in connection therewith and in the settlement of claims against it, and further agreed to co-operate with plaintiff and its attorney in the settlement of all such claims for labor and material then filed or thereafter to be filed against the building, on the lowest possible reasonable basis, stipulating that all settlements must be presented to and passed upon and approved by Mr. Nuckolls, the attorney of plaintiff, and Mr. Robinson, the representative of the surety company, it being expressly understood and agreed that in the settlement of such claims for labor and material the surety company should not be held responsible for a sum exceeding $1,600. Acting upon this letter, plaintiff undertook the completion of the building, and, with its said attorney, entered upon the endeavor to adjust the claims of a considerable number of mechanics and materialmen who had filed their claims of lien against the structure. When the time arrived for the adjustment of these claims, Mr. Nuckolls, acting as the attorney for the plaintiff, notified Mr. Robinson, the representative of the surety company, that he was ready to adjust said claims, and requested his co-operation; but Mr. Robinson refused to co-operate with Mr. Nuckolls in the adjustment and settlement of said claims, and expressly instructed him "to take any action he might deem proper." Thereupon the plaintiff and Mr. Nuckolls proceeded to adjust, compromise, and settle said claims, expending therefor the sum of $2,500; and, having completed the structure, the plaintiff rendered a report and account of the same to the United Surety Company, showing the items of its expenditure, and that there was a net deficit of $1,057.42, which it required the surety company to pay. This the latter refused to do, and thereupon the plaintiff commenced this action to recover said sum. The court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $939, from which judgment the defendant United Surety Company prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant in its brief upon appeal presents a number of points, in which it is contended that the court erred in the admission of evidence and in its findings of fact. When examined these several contentions refine themselves down to the single substantial point that the plaintiff failed to prove that the several claims of mechanics and materialmen which it had compromised and settled were in fact valid liens against the property. The contention of the appellant in this regard is that the only way in which the claims of such mechanics and materialmen could be established to be valid liens was by their litigation to judgment, and that under its bond it was only required to pay such liens as had thus been judicially determined to be valid.

[1, 2] An examination of the bond given by the appellant will show that it does not go so far, but only requires as a condition of the obligor's liability that the liens, "by the statutes of the state where the contract is to be performed, are valid liens." In addition to this, however, the court is of the opinion that the United Surety Company, in its agreement authorizing the plaintiff to proceed with the completion of the building, and to settle "all claims for labor or material now filed or hereafter to be filed," expressly authorized said plaintiff to make adjustment of all just and legal claims against the property, whether or not they had ripened into actual liens; for the evident desire of the surety company then was to effectuate an adjustment of their liability as quickly and as economically as possible, rather than to have prolonged an expensive litigation. The fact that its representatives changed their mind in this regard thereafter cannot rob their earlier agreement of its evident purpose and effect.

[3] In respect to the proofs in the case, we think the evidence offered on the part of the plaintiff shows that the only claims and liens settled by plaintiff or its attorney, acting under the surety company's authorization, were valid claims and liens. The appellant's objection that the claims and liens which the plaintiff and its attorney adjusted and settled were not first passed upon and approved by the representative of the surety company as its agreement provides is answered by the plaintiff's proof that, when these claims and liens were in shape for such adjustment and settlement, the representative of the surety company was notified of that fact, and his co-operation requested, but that he declined to act in the premises, or co-operate in any way in the settlement of the claims, but, on the other hand, instructed the attorney for the plaintiff to "take any action he might deem proper." This being its attitude then, the appellant cannot now be heard to complain that this portion of its agreement was not carried into effect.

We discover no error in the record.

1. FORCIBLE ENTRY AND DETAINER—24—DESCRIPTION IN LEASE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action of unlawful detainer, defendant alleged that the lease sued upon was void because it described the premises as a building on the southwesterly line of the two intersecting streets. The building was, in fact, situated on the southwest corner of such streets. Held, that the word "line," in the description, was erroneously used for "corner," and that, when correctly read, the lease was valid and sufficient to support the action.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Wm. Hoff Cook, of San Francisco, for appellant. Denson, Cooley & Denson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal in an action of unlawful detainer, in which judgment was rendered for plaintiff for restitution, cancellation of lease, and $500 for rent, costs, and $100 attorney's fees.

The main point relied upon by the defendant for a reversal of the judgment is that the lease sued upon is void by reason of an impossible description therein, and that until it shall have been reformed by an independent equitable action therefor the summary proceeding of unlawful detainer cannot be maintained.

[1] The premises are described as a certain building "on the southwesterly line of California and Larkin streets," in San Francisco. Taking judicial notice, as we may, of the streets in San Francisco, and of the direction in which they run, we know there is no southwesterly line of California and Larkin streets. The defendant, however, was able to find and take possession of the property intended to be covered by the description, and continued in possession until ousted by this proceeding, paying rent therefor during a portion of the time according to the terms of the indenture of lease. It is plain that the description of the premises is marred by a mere clerical error, and, if we substitute the word "corner" for "line," we have a correct description of the premises involved. That the parties intended the word

"line" to be "corner" is too plain to need argument; for the description, when read as a whole, shows the fact to be that the premises dealt with by the parties are situated on two streets, Larkin and California, and on the southwest corner thereof. Following the suggestion contained in the cases, it is apropos to say that, since the description was sufficient to enable the defendant to take possession of the property, and to continue therein and pay rent therefor during six months, it ought to be sufficient to enable him to know what property the plaintiff demanded that he surrender. The description afforded him sufficient information to find his way in, and it certainly ought to be deemed sufficient to enable him to find his way out, and we so hold. Pierce v. Minturn, 1 Cal. 470; Bulkley v. Devine, 127 Ill. 406, 20 N. E. 16, 3 L. R. A. 330; McLennan v. Grant, 8 Wash. 603, 36 Pac. 682; Whipple v. Shewalter, 91 Ind. 114; Hoyle v. Bush, 14 Mo. App. 408; Weaver v. Shipley, 127 Ind. 526, 27 N. E. 146; Jackson v. Perrine, 35 N. J. Law, 137; Richards v. Snider, 11 Or. 197, 3 Pac. 177.

[2] The record is not very clear as to the next point. Certain it is, however, that in a proceeding of this kind the plaintiff was entitled to a judgment not only for the rent that was due when the suit was commenced, but also for the rent that had accrued up to the time of judgment. Moreover, if the answer may be regarded as putting in issue the question of payment of the rent demanded, it is equally certain that there is nothing in the lease, as appears to be claimed by defendant, to show that the plaintiff had in his hands money belonging to the defendant or any one else which he might apply in payment of the rent for the period covered by the judgment.

The judgment awards to the plaintiff an attorney's fee of $100, taxed as costs. This was in accordance with an express provision of the lease; hence we see no merit in defendant's objection to the same.

The judgment is affirmed.

An answer which alleges that the plaintiff knew of the mortgage on chattels for which defendant gave a bill of sale warranting the title free from incumbrances, that plaintiff prepared the bill of sale, and that defendant did not know that the clause of warranty was therein at the time he signed it, does not allege such fraud or mistake as renders admissible parol evidence to vary the bill of sale.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action by Mary A. Elsom and another against W. T. Neff and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. Goodwin Williams, of Stockton, and W. M. Gardner, of Santa Cruz, for appellants. C. M. Cassin, of San Jose, and J. L. Johnston and W. P. Netherton, both of Santa Cruz, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendants for the sum of $495.40 upon their cross-complaint in an action brought by the plaintiffs to recover damages for certain alleged breaches of the covenants of certain agreements in writing between the parties in the course of an exchange of properties. The facts attending the execution of these agreements are substantially these:

During the year 1912 plaintiffs, being the owners of certain real property in the county of Santa Cruz, where they resided, and the defendants, being the owners of certain real and personal property in the county of Modoc, where they also resided, undertook to make an exchange of their respective properties, in the course of the consummation of which several written documents were contemporaneously executed. The plaintiffs transferred by grant deeds to the defendants their real properties in Santa Cruz county, and the defendants transferred to plaintiffs by like deeds, which also contained express warranties against incumbrances, their real properties in Modoc county, and also at the same time executed and delivered to the plaintiffs their bill of sale, transferring to the plaintiffs certain personal property, consisting of stock and farming implements, which were to be included in the exchange. They also executed and delivered to plaintiffs a written order upon a mill in Modoc county for lumber to the value of $350. At the time of the execution of these instruments two mortgages were in existence and of record upon the real property which the defendants were transferring to the plaintiffs, amounting to $5,500 which mortgages by the terms of the conveyance the plaintiffs assumed and agreed to pay to the extent of said sum. The plaintiffs also paid to the defendants the sum of $500, and executed an agreement in the form of a note, by the terms of which the plaintiff William M. Elsom promised to pay the defendant William T. Neff the further sum of $1,000, less such an amount as would be necessary to reduce all the incumbrances upon the real property deeded by defendants to plaintiffs to the aforesaid amount of $5,500. At the time of the execution of these several documents there were two chattel mortgages existing and of record upon the stock and farming implements transferred by the defendants to the plaintiffs, and which aggregated the sum of $1,329.29. No mention of these mortgages is made in the writings by which the exchange of properties was consummated, but in the bill of sale transferring these personal properties to the plaintiffs there is a clause by which the defendants covenant and agree "to warrant and defend the sale of the said property, goods, and chattels unto the said party of the second part against all and every person and persons lawfully claiming or to claim the same."

The exchange of their respective properties having been consummated by the foregoing instruments, the respective parties went into possession of their acquired holdings in May, 1912. About a year later the plaintiffs brought this action to recover damages in the sum of $3,759.05 for the alleged breach of the written covenants and agreements of the defendants in the aforesaid exchange of properties, setting forth fully in their complaint the several instruments, and averring that the defendants had been guilty of certain fraudulent acts and concealments with respect to the condition of said properties, and particularly of the existence of the chattel mortgages upon the personal property, which facts the plaintiffs aver they did not discover until after the consummation of the exchange, and the existence of which prevented their disposition of the larger portion of the personal property aforesaid. It is alleged that these chattel mortgages were still in existence at the time said action was brought, and that the defendants had failed, refused and neglected to pay off the same. Plaintiffs also alleged that the order for lumber which they had taken in the course of the exchange had been refused at the mill upon which it was drawn, to their detriment in the sum of $350.

The defendants in their answer admitted the main allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint with reference to the details of the said exchange, but denied that there was any fraud upon their part, and averred that the plaintiffs not only knew and were informed as to the existence and substantial amount of the chattel mortgages upon the personal property, but also that the plaintiffs verbally agreed to assume the same; and as to the clause of warranty in their bill of sale the defendants averred that the said bill of sale was prepared under the supervision and by the direction of the plaintiff William M. Elsom, and that the defendants did not know of the existence of said clause in that document at the time they signed it, and that the fact of the existence of said clause of warranty therein did not become known to them until the commencement of this action. As to the alleged failure of the mill to accept their order, the defendants denied the fact, and alleged that the said order was without consideration and that it was a mere gratuity to the plaintiffs. They also denied the existence of any defects in the other personal property, and further denied any fraudulent acts or intention on their part throughout the entire transaction. The defendants further presented their cross-complaint, setting up the note which the plaintiffs had given for the sum of $1,000, and praying judgment for the balance alleged to be due thereon.

Upon the trial of the cause before a jury upon the issues as thus presented, the plaintiffs introduced in evidence the several conveyances and other documents referred to in their complaint; and the plaintiff W. M. Elsom testified quite fully as to the various interviews of the parties leading up to the exchange of their properties, and also testified to the fact that he was unaware of the existence of the mortgages upon the personal property until some time after the transaction was consummated.

When the plaintiffs rested their case the defendants undertook to offer evidence tending to show that the plaintiffs had known of the existence of the chattel mortgages upon the personal property prior to the making of the bill of sale thereof to them, and that they had orally agreed to assume and pay the obligations which these mortgages secured. This testimony was chiefly given by the defendant William T. Neff and was admitted without objection. Thereupon the witness Neff was asked the question on direct examination as to whether he understood that he was warranting that there was no incumbrance upon the personal property at the time he executed the bill of sale, and whether he knew of or noticed the guaranty clause in the bill of sale at the time he signed the same. To these questions the plaintiffs offered an objection, which the court sustained, and the subject was not returned to during the further direct examination of the witness W. T. Neff, nor was it adverted to during the examination of any other witness for the defendants. Upon the cross-examination of the witness W. T. Neff, however, counsel for the plaintiffs took up the subject, and directing the attention of the witness to that portion of the defendants' answer in which they averred that the guaranty clause in the bill of sale was overlooked by and was unknown to them at the time it was signed, undertook to question the said witness W. T. Neff fully and searchingly as to the truth of that averment, and as to his alleged mistake in supposing that the bill of sale contained no such warranty. In response to the questions asked on this cross-examination the witness W. T. Neff testified as to the existence of such mistake on his part, and as to the fact that no such guaranty was intended by any of the parties to the transaction.

The jury returned a verdict against the plaintiffs upon their several causes of action, and in favor of the defendants upon their cross-complaint. The court adopted the verdict of the jury, and then proceeded to make its findings covering the issues in the case; and in so doing found that the plaintiffs knew of the existence of the chattel mortgages upon the personal property embraced in the bill of sale, and that they had agreed to assume the same, and that the warranty clause in the bill of sale was mistakenly inserted, and that the defendants were unaware of its presence therein at the time of its execution, and hence were not bound by it. The court also found in favor of the defendants upon their cross-complaint, and accordingly rendered judgment in their favor for the sum of $495.40.

The chief insistence of the plaintiffs and appellants in this court is that the trial court erred in the admission of oral evidence tending to vary the written agreements between the parties effectuating the exchange of their properties, and in making its findings and rendering its judgment in accordance with such oral evidence. This contention of the appellants is explicitly directed at the testimony of the witness W. T. Neff as to the oral understandings of the parties respecting the existence and assumption by the plaintiffs of the chattel mortgages upon the personal property covered by the defendants' bill of sale, and as to the mistake of said defendants in overlooking the guaranty clause in the said bill of sale at the time they signed it, and it is also explicitly directed at the findings and judgment of the court in accordance with such testimony.

[1, 2] Had this oral evidence been elicited by the defendants and admitted by the court over the plaintiffs' objection, their contention as to the court's errors in its admission and adoption would doubtless have been sustained upon this appeal; and this for the reason that the portions of the defendants' answer which refer to the subject are quite insufficient to raise an issue as to whether the clause in the bill of sale guaranteeing the title to the personal property was inserted therein or was signed by the defendants through any such fraud or mistake in law or fact as would have entitled the defendants to offer oral testimony establishing such fraud or mistake, and entitling them to be relieved of the effect of their written guaranty. But the difficulty with appellants' contention is that this entire line of testimony was elicited by themselves upon their cross-examination of the witness W. T. Neff, and after their own objection to the same testimony sought to be elicited from said Neff upon his direct examination had first been sustained and then withdrawn. Apparently the plaintiffs proceeded upon the theory that the defendants' answer in regard to these matters did raise an issue; and having proceeded upon this theory, and having themselves elicited practically all of the oral evidence which the record contains upon the subject, the plaintiffs are in no position to urge for the first time in this court that either the jury in its verdict or the court in its findings and judgment could not adopt and act upon this evidence, even though its effect was to vary the terms of the bill of sale in respect of the defendants' guaranty of the title to the personal property covered by it. In the case of Shroeder v. Mauzy, 16 Cal. App. at page 447, 118 Pac. at page 461, the court says:

"It has been repeatedly held in this state that where the trial court and the parties to an action proceed to a trial of the cause upon the theory that there is a material issue, and the court, upon evidence addressed to that issue and received without objection, finds in accordance with that evidence and upon the theory that an appropriate issue was raised by the pleadings, 'the parties will not, nor will either of them, be allowed here for the first time to say there was no such issue.' Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. 186; Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 221, 26 Pac. 80; Murdock v. Clarke, 90 Cal. 427, 27 Pac. 275; Klopper v. Levy, 98 Cal. 525, 33 Pac. 444; *Rudel v. This is practically the only point in the case. The judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

BAILLARGEON v. MYERS. (Civ. 1541.)
(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 19, 1915.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞705—INJURIES FROM NEGLIGENT DRIVING—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

While it is negligence per se to drive on the left-hand side of a street in violation of a municipal ordinance, a person so driving was not liable for injuries to plaintiff, unless such negligence was the proximate cause of such injury.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞706—INJURIES FROM NEGLIGENT DRIVING—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Defendant was driving an automobile westerly on the left-hand side of F. street, in violation of an ordinance. Plaintiff, a boy 12 years old, was riding a bicycle southerly towards F street. As he reached that street, he tried to stop, but discovered that his brakes would not work, and proceeded across to the south side of such street to turn easterly, and as he was completing his turn he collided with the automobile. He had tried his brakes on the same day and they then worked all right, and he did not discover until the moment he reached F. street that they would not work. He had been traveling about eight miles an hour down a grade of about 14 per cent., and did not try to stop the speed of the bicycle until just as he reached F. street. Held that, as no intervening cause existed from which it could be inferred that defendant's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury, a nonsuit could not properly have been granted, on the ground that there was no testimony that defendant's negligence caused the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1518; Dec. Dig. ☞706.]

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞706—INJURIES FROM NEGLIGENT DRIVING—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether plaintiff was negligent was a question for the jury, in view of his age and experience, the kind of care used by him in controlling his bicycle and its brake, and in keeping it in safe condition, as well as the other facts mentioned.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1518; Dec. Dig. ☞706.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞706—INJURIES FROM NEGLIGENT DRIVING—UNAVOIDABLE ACCIDENT.

It could not be said, as a matter of law, that plaintiff's injuries were caused by an unavoidable accident.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by David Baillargeon, a minor, by Marietta Baillargeon, his guardian ad litem, against J. H. W. Myers. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Isidore B. Dockweiler, Robert B. Murphey, and H. Graham Bockius, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Morton, Hollzer & Morton and W. W. Butler, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment rendered pursuant to an order granting defendant's motion for a nonsuit. The plaintiff, a boy 12 years old, brought this action to recover damages for personal injuries received in a collision which occurred between an automobile of the defendant and a bicycle on which the plaintiff was riding. At the conclusion of the evidence received on behalf of the plaintiff, the defendant moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds: (1) That the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in coming down Clay street, in the city of Los Angeles, from the crest of Clay street to its intersection with Fourth street, a distance of approximately 150 yards, in the manner and under the circumstances shown by the evidence; (2) that there is no testimony indicating that the defendant was guilty of any negligence; (3) that, if the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence, then the same evidence necessarily shows that the accident was unavoidable and without fault of either party.

On June 26, 1911, when the accident occurred, there was in force an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles requiring that:

"Every person riding, driving, propelling, or in charge of any vehicle * * * upon any street within the city of Los Angeles * * * shall travel on the right-hand side of such street and as near the right-hand curb thereof as possible."

Violation of any of the provisions of this ordinance was declared to be a misdemeanor. At the time of the accident in question the defendant's automobile was traveling westerly on Fourth street, and was entirely on the south side of the street, which was the left-hand side as the automobile was moving. The plaintiff was riding a bicycle which was equipped with a coaster brake and was traveling southerly on Clay street toward the intersection of Fourth. During the last 150 yards of his passage over Clay street he was going downhill on a grade of approximately 14 per cent. From curb to curb the width of Fourth street in that block is 40 feet, and the width of Clay street is 20 feet. When the plaintiff got to Fourth street he tried to stop his bicycle, and discovered that his coaster brake would not work. He proceeded straight across Fourth street to the south side thereof to make the turn easterly. As he was completing this turn on West Fourth street he collided with the defendant's automobile, which was moving as before stated, and was thereby thrown from the bicycle and received the injuries of which he complains. The plaintiff had tried his brakes before the accident on that same day, and they worked all right; until the moment of his entering Fourth street, as above stated, he did not discover that the brakes would not work. It is not claimed that the defendant's automobile was moving at an excessive rate of speed. The plaintiff's bicycle, just prior to the collision, was going at about 8 miles per hour. The plaintiff did all that he could to stop his bicycle before reaching Fourth street. At the time of the collision he was on the south side of Fourth street, which for him was the right side of the street, and where he was entitled to be. If the defendant's automobile at that time had not been on that side of the street, which for it was the wrong side, this accident could not have occurred.

[1, 2] Respondent's counsel, while conceding that respondent was guilty of negligence per se in operating his automobile on the wrong side of the street in violation of a municipal ordinance, insist that this is not sufficient to make out a case of liability against respondent. They say, and in this we agree, that the law requires it to be shown that the particular negligence in question was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury. There must be a causal connection between the unlawful act and the injury. This rule is stated in Cary v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 604, 108 Pac. 682, 684, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329, where the court further says:

"For example, it is negligence if the whistle of a locomotive engine is not sounded and its bell rung at crossings, but, if the train were derailed by a misplaced switch, an injured passenger could not base his recovery upon the showing that somewhere along the journey the whistle had not been blown or the bell sounded when these things should have been done."

In the case at bar the negligent act of the defendant was not one which preceded and was completed prior to the time of the accident, but was continuing at the very moment of the collision. No intervening cause existed from which it could be inferred that defendant's negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury. It follows that a nonsuit could not properly have been granted upon the ground that there is no testimony indicating that the defendant's negligence caused the injury to the plaintiff. The claim that the accident and injury were not caused proximately by defendant's negligence should not be confused with the defense of contributory negligence. That is another subject which we will now consider.

[3, 4] Respondent's contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is based upon facts shown with regard to the manner in which plaintiff rode his bicycle down Clay street to the intersection of Fourth street. The facts specially relied upon, as stated in the motion when made in the superior court, were that the plaintiff rode down Clay street without a brake or any means upon his wheel to stop or slow the speed of the bicycle; that he did not try to stop the speed of the bicycle at all; that some one called to him as he approached Fourth street, and he was then going so fast that he could not stop the bicycle, and then discovered for the first time that the coaster brake would not work; and that if the plaintiff had used ordinary means to prevent the accident the accident would have been prevented. Conceding that the facts in evidence had some tendency to show negligence on the part of the plaintiff, we cannot say that, as a matter of law, such negligence was conclusively proved. At most, it was sufficient to present a question for the jury to determine. The age and experience of this boy; the kind of care used by him in controlling his bicycle and the attached coaster brake, and in keeping the same in safe condition; the fact that he had tested the brake earlier in the day and found it in good condition; and the fact that after discovering the uselessness of the brake he kept the bicycle on his own side of the road, and was using all means in his power to get out of the difficulty without infringing upon the right of way of the defendant—these and all other details of fact connected with the conduct of the plaintiff at and immediately preceding the accident were circumstances from which the jury might or might not conclude that the plaintiff was guilty of negligence, and might or might not conclude that such negligence contributed proximately to the collision and injury which occurred. We are further satisfied that it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff's injuries were caused by unavoidable accident.

The judgment is reversed.

DE FREITAS et ux. v. TOWN OF SUISUN.

(Sac. 2156.)

1. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ⚭107—DIVERSION OF UNDERGROUND WATER—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

The measure of damages for the diversion of underground water supplying springs on plaintiff's land was the difference between the value of the land before the diversion and its value after the diversion, determined by its actual market value, as to which net revenue might be considered, but would not generally furnish a conclusive measure of value.

2. EVIDENCE ⚭113—VALUE OF LAND—INCOME AS BASIS.

In an action for damages for the diversion of underground waters supplying springs on plaintiff's land, the admission of evidence as to the value of the land, based on its gross income capitalized, less one-half for expenditures, was error, since neither gross nor net revenue capitalized afforded a proper basis from an estimate of the actual market value.

3. EVIDENCE ⚭543—EXPERT TESTIMONY—VALUE.

A witness who had seen and examined the land, who knew something of its character and condition, or of the market values of land in the vicinity, if such values have been established, or the values of land similarly situated, might give his opinion as to the value of the land with and without underground water supplying a spring.

4. EVIDENCE ¶572 — EXPERT TESTIMONY — WEIGHT.

The weight of the testimony of expert witnesses as to the value of land before and after the diversion of underground spring water depends on the knowledge he shows in his answers to the preliminary questions and on cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2395-2398; Dec. Dig. ¶572.]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR ¶1050 — HARMLESS ERROR — ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for damages for the diversion of underground water supplying springs on plaintiff's land, where the evidence as to its value was unsatisfactory, error in the admission of evidence as to its value, based upon the gross or net revenue from the land, was prejudicial.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by Joseph L. de Freitas and wife against the Town of Suisun. Judgment for plaintiffs, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

T. T. C. Gregory and C. J. Goodell, both of San Francisco (Theodore W. Chester, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellant. Frank L. Coombs and E. S. Bell, both of Napa, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff Joseph de Freitas is the owner in fee of 50 acres of land in which Marianna de Freitas has a life interest; that Joseph is in possession under lease from Marianna; that the defendant is the owner of an adjoining tract of land containing 171 acres; that upon the plaintiffs' land there were springs the waters of which, for more than 30 years past, plaintiffs have used to irrigate their said land; that in the year 1908 the defendant dug a tunnel on its land near the plaintiffs' line for the purpose of obtaining water therefrom; that by said tunnel it diverted the underground water supplying plaintiffs' springs and caused the same to become dry, thereby depriving plaintiffs of water belonging to their land, to their damage in the sum of $10,000. The defendant answered, denying the allegations of the complaint. There was a trial by jury, resulting in a verdict in favor of "the plaintiff" in the sum of $4,000. The court thereupon entered judgment in favor of Joseph L. de Freitas against the defendant for said sum.

It is claimed that the evidence does not sustain the allegation that the tunnel dug by the defendant intercepted the water sources supplying the plaintiffs' springs. The evidence on this point is not satisfactory, but we cannot say that it is insufficient to warrant the conclusion that the defendant's tunnel intercepted the flow to plaintiffs' springs and diverted the water thereof from plaintiffs' land. We cannot disturb the verdict on that account.

[1, 2] We think the court below erred in overruling defendant's objections to hypothetical questions put to the witness Gordon regarding the value of the land in question and the damages sought by the plaintiffs and in refusing to strike out his answers. The measure of damages caused by the diversion of water from plaintiffs' springs would be the difference between the value of plaintiffs' land before the diversion complained of and its value if it were permanently deprived of the water so diverted. The witness Gordon was produced to give evidence upon this subject. He stated that he was a farmer and fruit grower, and that he had seen the plaintiffs' land a few days before the trial, but had not examined it with any view to estimating its value; that he owned some land and was acquainted with land values in the vicinity and with the market values of the class of land such as that of the plaintiffs'. Thereupon the plaintiffs' counsel put to him a hypothetical question, in substance as follows:

"Conceding that the town of Suisun dug the tunnel and struck the main flow of water at the end of the tunnel about the 8th of September, 1908; that prior to that date there were springs on plaintiffs' land the waters of which the plaintiff had used to irrigate a part of the land; that by reason of such irrigation, Mr. Freitas could and did cultivate strawberries, blackberries, raspberries, and vegetables on that part of said land; that Mr. Freitas took off and received therefrom a gross income of $1,200 a year, average, and from the unirrigated portions thereof a gross average income of $600, and taking into consideration that this was outside of the question of having a living from the place, using what was there—now, under these circumstances, what would have been, in your estimation, the value of that whole piece of property, the 50 acres, giving the value of the irrigated and the unirrigated ground separately?"

To this the witness answered:

"Well, from grounds that produced a gross income of $1,200 a year I should say from $8,000 to $10,000; the balance producing a gross income of $600 I should say it would be worth from $4,000 to $5,000."

The witness was then asked what the damage would be to the land if the town tunnel had dried up the springs formerly supplying Freitas' land, and permanently deprived it of the use of all that water for irrigating purposes, whereby the gross annual income of that irrigated land had been reduced to $200.

The witness answered that the loss would be from $6,000 to $8,000. On cross-examination the witness stated that he based his estimates of value on gross income, deducting one-half for expenses of production and allowing 6 per centum interest on the investment. In other words, he capitalized the gross income of $1,200, less one-half for expenditures. He also testified that he knew nothing of the actual yield of the land or of the expense of growing, harvesting, and marketing the crops produced from it. The defendant moved to strike out all the testimony of Gordon as to value and damage on the ground that he was not qualified to speak as an expert on the value of the Freitas place. The motion was denied.

The facts stated in the question gave no proper basis for an estimate of value. Gross income does not determine value. It might be all used up in expenses, in which case, upon the theory proposed, the land would be worthless, although its actual market value might be considerable. The witness had no knowledge of the expenses of production. His allowance of one-half was purely arbitrary, and there was no evidence to sustain it. Other evidence produced in defense tended to show that such expense was far more than one-half of the gross receipts. Moreover, if it were the law that the value is to be ascertained by the mere capitalization of the net revenue, the evidence should be confined to proof of facts showing the net revenue. That being ascertained, the value would not be a question for an expert, but a mere question of mathematics, a calculation which the court should make or direct the jury to make. The truth is the amount of actual net revenue does not determine the value of land in every case. The revenue would vary according to the industry, skill, and wisdom of the person cultivating the land. Its net revenue, assuming reasonable skill in cultivation and management, would be the criterion, so far as that element alone is concerned. But other elements, such as the state of the market, the demand and supply of land of the character in question, the prospects of advance, and perhaps other things, would ordinarily affect the question of value and fix it at a sum different from that produced by capitalization of net revenue. The actual market value is the thing to be determined, and while net revenue should be considered, it does not, in general, furnish a conclusive measure of such market value. In the present case, however, the questions, both as to value and damage, were framed upon the erroneous theory that value may be determined from gross revenue alone, and neither of them should have been allowed.

[3] It should not be difficult to prove value and damage in a legal manner by competent witnesses. By preliminary questions the examiner should elicit the facts relating to the qualifications of the witnesses; for example, that he has seen and examined the land, or that he knows something of its character and condition, or the market values of land in that vicinity, if such values have been established, or the values of land similarly situated, and the like. He may, thereupon, be asked to give his opinion of its respective values with and without the use of the water in question. From such evidence the court or jury can estimate the amount of damage caused by the deprivation of the water, if they shall find that there is such and that it is produced by defendant's tunnel.

[4, 5] The weight of the testimony of such witnesses will, of course, depend upon the knowledge he shows in his answers to the preliminary questions and on cross-examination. He should not be asked regarding specific facts in the examination in chief. The rules controlling such examinations are well established. See C. P. R. Co. v. Pearson, 35 Cal. 262; Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 544.

[6] One witness for plaintiff testified properly to the value of the land. Taking the evidence as a whole, however, it was not satisfactory on this subject, and we cannot say that the erroneous admission of this evidence did not affect the minds of the jury in their deliberations. On the contrary, we believe that it probably did influence them. Under these circumstances the court cannot say that the error was without prejudice.

The judgment and order are reversed.

"4th. I bequeath to Jessie Maud Stephens one thousand dollars, same to be held in trust and the principal and interest to be paid to Bartlett Stephens when he arrives at the age of twenty-five years.

"5th. I bequeath to Roscoe Smith of Santa Clara, Cal., one thousand dollars. The same to be paid to him when he arrives at the age of twenty-five years.

"6th. I bequeath to Ruth Keys of Santa Clara, Cal., the sum of five thousand dollars, said sum to be held in trust by her mother, Lizzie Imogene Keys. The principal and interest to be paid to Ruth Keys when she arrives at the age of twenty-five years."

As to the fourth legacy the court in its decree of distribution declared as follows:

"And it further appearing to the satisfaction of the court that the $1,000 legacy bequeathed to Jessie Maud Stephens to be held in trust to be paid to said Bartlett Stephens when he arrives at the age of 25 years is, to the extent of 4 years invalid, but is valid to the extent of holding the same in trust until he arrives at the age of 21."

As to the fifth legacy it found that the term of 25 years was void to the excess of 4 years after Roscoe Smith attained majority, and that at the time of the decree he had passed his majority. As to the sixth legacy it found, in like manner, that the limitation in the trust of 7 years after Ruth Keys attained her majority was void, and that at the time of distribution she was over the age of 18 years. The decree then proceeded to distribute these legacies directly to the beneficiaries. Eugene Adolph Yates, one of the residuary legatees under the will, has appealed from this decree, attacking only the construction which the court has put upon these legacies in trust.

[1] While the language of these legacies differs somewhat, it is apparent that there was no difference in the trusts sought to be declared by the testator. In the fifth and sixth legacies he bequeathed the money directly to the legatees, declaring, in effect, that the legacies should be paid only when the legatees reached a designated age. In the fourth the bequest was in terms to a trustee, to hold the principal and accumulate the interest and pay it to the beneficiary when he reached the age of 25 years. This legacy contains a similar provision for the retention and accumulation of income. The fifth is silent upon the matter. These trusts do no violence to the rule against perpetuities and the undue suspension of the power of alienation. Civ. Code, §§ 715, 716. While a limitation of years is fixed by the terms of the trust, the ultimate duration of each trust is manifestly based upon a life in being. In each one of these cases, should the beneficiary die, the trust absolutely determines for lack of a beneficiary. Trusts such as this have received elaborate consideration by this court in Estate of Hendy, 118 Cal. 656, 50 Pac. 753, and Estate of Steele, 124 Cal. 533, 57 Pac. 564, and it is sufficient upon this point to refer to those cases.

[2] The legacies were vested. Notwithstanding the unimportant differences in their phraseology, each and all manifest a clear intent upon the part of the testator to give the sums named to the beneficiaries. The time of payment only was postponed, and trusts for accumulations created to cover the time of the deferred payment. There was no bequest over in the event of death. Under all of the authorities the legacies vested in the legatees an absolute, indefeasible and disposable interest. Estate of Young, 123 Cal. 337, 55 Pac. 1011; Estate of Budd, 166 Cal. 286, 135 Pac. 1131; Wardwell v. Hale, 161 Mass. 396, 37 N. E. 196, 42 Am. St. Rep. 413; Furness v. Fox, 1 Cush. (Mass.) 134, 48 Am. Dec. 593; Claffin v. Claffin, 149 Mass. 19, 20 N. E. 454, 3 L. R. A. 370, 14 Am. St. Rep. 393; 1 Jarman on Wills, Bigelow's Edition, 794.

[3] The direction in these trusts for accumulations beyond the age of the minority of the legatees is unquestionably void. Civ. Code, §§ 723, 724. But this fact does not in law operate to destroy the trust in its creation, but merely to avoid the provision for the illegal accumulations (Civ. Code, § 725), with the result that the legatees after maturity would be entitled to receive the incomes of the trust funds.

[4] We come to the final consideration, that of the immediate payability of the corpus of these legacies in trust to the legatees upon their attaining majority. The court decreed such payment, following the English rule of Saunders v. Vautier, 4 Beav. 115. In that case the testator bequeathed to trustees certain stock—

"upon trust to accumulate the interest and dividends which should accrue thereon until Daniel Wright Vautier should attain his age of twenty-five years, and then to pay or transfer the principal of such stock, together with such accumulated interest and dividends unto the said Daniel Wright Vautier, his executors, administrators and assigns absolutely."

Notwithstanding the provision for accumulation the Master of the Rolls, upon application, ordered the payment of £100 a year out of the dividends of the stock to be paid to the legatee during his minority, an equitable rule recognized and adopted in this state by section 726 of the Civil Code. When the legatee attained his majority, application was made by him for the payment in full of the legacy and its accumulations. The application was opposed. It was held that the legatee took under the terms of the will a vested interest. The Master of the Rolls decided that it had been repeatedly declared in the English courts that:

"Where the payment is postponed, the legatee, if he has an absolute, indefeasible interest in the legacy, is not bound to wait until the expiration of that period, but may require payment the moment he is competent to give a valid discharge."

Indisputably, if this rule of construction is to be here adopted and applied to the legacies under consideration, the court's decree was in all respects correct. We are not, however, disposed thus to do violence to the language of a trust which is unquestionably valid. There is nothing in our law to forbid a man from declaring a trust either by will or by deed, whereby the income of certain property shall be paid to a son until he attains the age of 25 years when the corpus of the trust property shall be, made over to him. True, under such a trust the beneficiary would take a vested interest which would fall into his estate upon his death, and which he even might dispose of by gift or sale during his lifetime. But, upon the other hand, the fact that these important property rights vest in the beneficiary should not, we think, be regarded as so controlling as to justify a violence done to the plain intent of the trustor. The trustor may have had good reason, as in the case of a spendthrift son, for desiring that the principal sum of his bounty should not go absolutely to the legatee upon his attaining majority. Because the legatee himself might circumvent this purpose by making a sale of his vested interest is not, we think, a sufficient ground for destroying the legal intent of a trustor in creating such a trust. The fact that because of the particular wording of a valid trust the legatee himself may impair its efficacy is not a justification for equity so to do. We conclude, therefore, that these trusts still continue for the period of time in them specified; that as each of the legatees attains his majority he is entitled to the accumulations and to the later accruing income of the trust fund; that each legatee has a disposable interest in the corpus of the trust, but that that corpus is to be given over to him when and only when he reaches the years named in the trust.

For these reasons the decree appealed from is ordered modified in the indicated particulars, that is to say, it will be decreed that Ruth Keys, upon attaining majority, is entitled to the accumulated income of her legacy in trust, and thereafter until she arrives at the age of 25 years is entitled to the income of the trust fund, and upon attaining the age of 25 years is immediately entitled to receive the corpus of the fund, and mutatis mutandis the same decree will be entered as to the legacies of $1,000 to Roscoe Smith and Bartlett Stephens.

SAN JOAQUIN VALLEY BANK v. GATE CITY OIL CO. et al. (Sac. 2147.)

Rehearing Denied June 24, 1915.)

1. CORPORATIONS ⇐414 — EXECUTION OF NOTES—LIABILITY.

A note, signed by the president and secretary of a corporation and individuals, but without the name of the corporation as maker, or the corporate seal, or anything to indicate that the note is the obligation of the corporation, is a valid obligation of the corporation, where it negotiated a loan evidenced by the note, received the money thereon, expended the same for its own purposes, and the president and secretary signed the note intending to execute it as the note of the corporation, and it was accepted on that understanding, and the board of directors and stockholders approved the action of the officers as binding the corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1640-1646; Dec. Dig. ⇐414.]

2. PLEADING ⇐246 — COMPLAINT—AMENDMENTS—ALLOWANCE.

It is proper to allow an amendment to the complaint which does not prejudice defendant, except by depriving him of an opportunity to defeat a just claim on technical grounds.

3. EVIDENCE ⇐459 — PAROL EVIDENCE — VARYING NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

Where a note was signed by the president and secretary of a corporation, who intended to bind the corporation thereby, though it did not appear in the note that it was a party thereto, evidence of the conversations at the time of the negotiation of the loan, evidenced by the note and the delivery of the note, and that the money was loaned to the corporation and used by it, was admissible, for it did not alter or vary the note, but only showed its execution.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by the San Joaquin Valley Bank against the Gate City Oil Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. R. Jacobs and A. H. Carpenter, both of Stockton, for appellants. R. C. Minor and Nutter & Orr, all of Stockton, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This was an action to recover $6,000 upon a promissory note alleged to have been executed by the defendants to the plaintiff. The defendants answered, denying the execution of the note. The court made findings and gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff against all the defendants. The Gate City Oil Company and J. F. Lynch appealed from the judgment within 60 days after its entry. They claim, in support of their appeal, that they did not execute the note set out in the complaint, and that there is a variance between the allegations and the proof concerning the note. The merits of these objections can best be shown by a chronological statement of the case.

In 1907 the Gate City Oil Company was in need of the sum of $6,000. Its directors passed a resolution authorizing its officers to negotiate a loan for that amount. Upon this authority certain of its officers, including Lynch, appeared at the plaintiff's banking house, and it was there agreed between them and the plaintiff that the plaintiff would loan $6,000 upon the joint note of the Gate City Oil Company and the three defendants, Smith, Lynch, and Giottonini. A printed form of note was handed to these officers for execution. They presently returned with the note. Its opening clause was as follows:

"Stockton, Cal., Sept. 20th, 1907. One day after date, for value received, we or each of us promise to pay to the San Joaquin Valley Bank, or order," etc.

The closing sentence and the signatures were as follows:

"All payments which become due by virtue hereof are to be paid in United States gold coin.

"J. W. Mosher, Pres.

"Ira E. Smith, Secy.

"J. Jerome Smith.

"J. F. Lynch.

"F. F. Giottonini."

The genuineness of these signatures is conceded. This note, thus executed, was offered to the plaintiff, in pursuance of the previous negotiations, as the note of the Gate City Oil Company and the three other defendants, it was accepted as such, and the $6,000 was delivered to that company. There was nothing in the body of the note to show that the Gate City Oil Company was one of the makers thereof. Some three years later it was discovered that the name of the corporation was not subscribed as one of the makers, and that the corporate seal was not attached. Thereupon, at the request of the plaintiff, the corporate seal, which showed an imprint of its name, was placed upon the note at the proper place. The directors of the Gate City Oil Company thereupon passed a resolution, which was entered on its minutes, declaring that the act of giving the said note by the Gate City Oil Company was approved and ratified as the act of the corporation. A meeting of the stockholders was also duly called and was attended by members holding more than four-fifths of the shares. At this meeting a resolution was unanimously adopted ratifying and approving the act of the corporation in giving the note in question as the note of the corporation. The Gate City Oil Company paid interest on the note quarterly until March 20, 1912, which was some six months after this action was begun. The complaint, as first filed, set forth the note in full. The signatures were given as follows:

"Gate City Oil Co. [Seal.]

"J. W. Mosher, Pres.

"Ira E. Smith, Secy.

"J. Jerome Smith.

"J. F. Lynch.

"F. F. Giottonini."

At the trial it appeared that the name "Gate City Oil Co." had never been written in the signature of the note, but that the seal, with the name imprinted in it, had been attached prior to the beginning of the action. Objections being made on this ground, the plaintiff, by leave of court, amended its complaint to conform to the proof. This complaint alleged the execution of the note as the note of the Gate City Oil Company and the other parties defendant, but without the seal affixed or the name "Gate City Oil Co." appearing among the signatures. It then proceeded to allege the subsequent affixing of the corporate seal and the resolutions of the board of directors and stockholders, ratifying and approving the note as the note of said company. The court thereupon made its finding, setting forth the facts substantially as above recited, and stating that the words "Gate City Oil Co." as the signature of said company, and the seal of said company, were omitted from the note, at the time of its first execution, by inadvertence, and that it was intended that the note should be, and that it actually was and is, the note of the corporation and the other defendants.

[1] The objection is now made that the note is not the obligation of the Gate City Oil Company. There is evidence showing that the company negotiated the loan; that it received the money thereon and expended the same for its own purposes; that its president and secretary signed the note, intending thereby to execute it as the note of the corporation; and that it was accepted upon that understanding. The subsequent actions of the board of directors and stockholders of the company approving the action of the officers, as above stated, were also proven by sufficient evidence. These acts and resolutions constituted a sufficient execution of the note by the corporation. They all occurred before the action was begun. At that time, therefore, the note had been executed by the Gate City Oil Company, and it was properly declared on as an obligation of that company. There was no substantial variance between the allegations of the amended complaint and the proof.

[2] The amendment was properly allowed. It caused no prejudice to the appellants, unless the deprivation of an opportunity to defeat a just claim on unsubstantial and technical grounds can be said to be prejudicial. The rule is to the contrary.

[3] There was no error in allowing evidence of the conversations at the time the loan was negotiated and the note delivered, or of the fact that the money was loaned to the defendant company and was used by it. This evidence was not offered to alter or vary the terms of the note, but to show its execution.

The judgment is affirmed.

COFFEY v. CITY OF BERKELEY.

(S. F. 6533.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 27, 1915.)

1. BRIDGES — DUTY TO BUILD.

A city is under no common-law duty to build bridges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bridges, Cent. Dig. §§ 9-13, 15, 16; Dec. Dig. § 7.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — FAILURE TO BUILD BRIDGES—LIABILITY.

A statute imposing no duty on a city to build bridges, but at most giving it discretionary power, any right of action against a city for defective condition of a highway, given by St. 1911, p. 1115, imposes no liability on it for nonaction with respect to building a bridge where a street intersects a creek.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DANGEROUS STREETS—GUARDING AGAINST ACCIDENTS—COMPLAINT.

The sort of a safeguard against accidents where a street intersected a creek with steep banks and no bridge, being largely in the city's discretion, a complaint for injury to a traveler is insufficient in alleging failure to maintain signals, lights, or other warning, but should state that the city totally failed to guard against accidents.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — DEFECTIVE STREETS—ACCIDENTS—COMPLAINT.

St. 1911, p. 1115, declaring a city liable for injury from a defective street only if the officer charged with the duty of repairing be innocent of knowledge or notice of the condition, a complaint to charge a city should exonerate such officer.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. H. Waste, Judge.

Action by James Coffey against the City of Berkeley. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Keogh & Olds, of San Francisco, and Reed, Black, Reed & Bingham, and De Lancey C. Smith, all of Oakland, for appellant. Redmond C. Staats, City Atty., of Berkeley (Geo. L. Hughes, of Berkeley, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered as a consequence of the sustaining of a demurrer to his complaint.

The action was for damages due, as alleged, on account of injuries sustained by plaintiff in an accident which resulted from the fall into Cordonices creek of an automobile in which he was a passenger. The plaintiff in his complaint alleged that Cornell avenue "at its point of intersection with Cordonices creek, within the boundaries and limits of said city of Berkeley, was in a dangerous and defective condition, in this, that said defendant with full knowledge of the condition of said Cornell avenue had failed and neglected to erect or maintain any bridge or other structure over said Cordonices creek, at said point of intersection with Cornell avenue over and along which the public might travel; that said Cordonices creek at the said point aforesaid, has a deep channel, to wit, about 15 feet below the grade of said Cornell avenue, and the banks thereof are steep and dangerous; that said defendant at all of the time herein mentioned failed to keep or maintain any signals, lights, or other warnings to notify the public or persons traveling over and along said Cornell avenue of the dangerous and defective condition thereof at the point above mentioned." It is further alleged that on a certain date, after dark, when the dangerous and defective condition of the street was not visible to persons passing along and over it, plaintiff and his companions in an automobile were, by reason of the dangerous and defective condition of said Cornell avenue where it intersects Cordonices creek, precipitated over the bank into the bottom of the creek; and that at the time of the accident Cornell avenue was being carefully used by plaintiff.

The demurrer was both general and special. Respondent insists that no duty rests upon the defendant or its officers to build or maintain bridges either within its own municipal boundaries, or across a stream which is a boundary between it and another political subdivision of the state; and that it is not required by any law to maintain signals, lights, or other warnings of the natural dangers existing at the intersection of the avenue with the creek.

We are asked by respondent at the outset to take judicial cognizance of the fact that Cordonices creek is not wholly within its municipal territory, but is the boundary line between the city of Berkeley and the city of Albany at the point of intersection with Cornell avenue. Stats. 1909, p. 1212. We find no necessity for exercising the right invoked by respondent, because, even assuming that the allegations of the complaint bring the entire crossing of the street with the creek within the limits of the city of Berkeley, and treating the creek as a waterway intersecting the street within the city, we are compelled to agree with the views taken by the court below.

[1, 2] A city was under no duty at common law to build bridges within its limits or across bordering streams. 5 Cyc. 1054. Under the charter of Berkeley that municipal corporation is given authority and dominion over its streets and doubtless that authority would extend to the erection of bridges wholly within the corporate limits of the city, but in no instance is the city obligated by law to build or to maintain any such structure. Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations says that the duties and the powers of cities with reference to bridges are entirely statutory, there being no common-law liability with respect to the repair of bridges. In Barnett v. Contra Costa County, 67 Cal. 78, 7 Pac. 177, it was held that a county is not responsible in damages even for its failure to keep in repair an existing bridge, and in Winbigler v. Los Angeles, 45 Cal. 37, it was decided that, even conceding that a correlative duty to keep the streets in repair arose from the authority to repair them, nevertheless the duty rested upon the city council and not upon the city. But appellant pins his faith upon an act relating to the liability of public officers for damages resulting from defects or dangers in streets, etc. Stats. 1911, p. 1115. This statute provides that if, in consequence of the dangerous or defective condition of any street, any one shall suffer injury to his person, no officer who has charge of or whose duty it is to care for or repair such street shall be liable for such injury unless such officer shall have had actual notice of the defective condition of the street and shall have failed for a reasonable time after notice to repair the same (provided he had authority to remedy the condition and funds were available for that purpose), and provided further that the damage was sustained while the street was being carefully used and due caution exercised to avoid the danger; but in all such cases (to quote directly from the statute) "damage may be recovered against the county, city, or city and county as in ordinary actions for damages." Appellant insists that this statute gives a right of action against any municipality for any injury received by reason of the defective condition of a highway within the limits thereof, and that the authorities cited have ceased to be of any value. But even if we concede that position, appellant's pleading is not aided because he does not count upon a defective condition of the highway, but a failure to bridge a creek and a further failure to light the place where the street ends and the creek exists. In deciding to erect a bridge a public corporation is exercising discretionary power. Action or non-action in that regard can lead to no liability. 3 Abbott, Mun. Corp. § 1024. The complaint alleges no duty upon the part of the defendant to erect or maintain a bridge, and we find no such duty imposed by law; therefore in the allegations with reference to the absence of a bridge at the intersection of the street with Cordonices creek, the complaint fails to state a cause of action.

[3] Nor does it appear from the pleading that defendant is liable for failure to maintain signals, lights, or other warnings at the intersection of Cornell avenue and Cordonices creek. The manner and extent of protection against possible accidents within its borders and upon its streets are both confided so largely to the discretion of a municipal corporation that courts will seldom hold such a corporation responsible for failing to supply more elaborate and complete protection. 4 Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1696. In Iowa it has been held that it is not left to the courts to say in what particular manner a city may exercise its power to provide for the illumination of its streets. Blain v. Town of Montezuma, 150 Iowa, 142, 129 N. W. 808, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 543, Ann. Cas. 1912D, 430. It is true that the pleading here under consideration does contain the averment that at the place where the accident occurred the banks of the creek were steep and dangerous, but it does not contain any allegation either that the street was an improved, much used highway, or that no protection whatever was provided for the traveling public. It may even be that some physical barrier was maintained, so far as anything in the complaint is concerned. The pleader predicated negligence upon the failure of the city to maintain signals, lights, or other warnings. As the sort of safeguard lay largely within the discretion of the defendant, the complaint to be sufficient should have contained a statement that defendant totally failed to guard against accidents.

[4] Thus far we have discussed the complaint upon the assumption that the statute of 1911 gave full authority to any one injured on a public street to sue the municipality. An examination of that enactment will show at once, however, that the city was to be liable only in the event that the officer charged with the duty of repairing a street should be innocent of knowledge or notice of the condition of that street from which the accident became possible. In order, therefore, to state the city's liability the complaint should aver facts exonerating the officer or board charged with the care and repair of the street in question. No such allegations appear in the pleadings, and for that reason also the demurrer was properly sustained.

BARBER ASPHALT PAVING CO. v.
JURGENS. (S. F. 6460.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 28, 1915.
Rehearing Denied June 26, 1915.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 122 — ORDINANCES — PUBLICATION — CHARTER PROVISIONS.

Oakland City Charter (St. 1862, p. 353) § 53, provides that all ordinances shall be published by written advertisements posted at the mayor's office and at three other public places, or in a newspaper published in the city, and that every ordinance shall be presented to the mayor for approval and signature, and that, if he disapproves of it, he shall return it within five days, and that the city council shall reconsider it, and, if approved by two-thirds of its members, it shall take effect as an ordinance. Code Civ. Proc. § 459, declares that in pleading a private statute or a right derived therefrom it is sufficient to refer to such statute by its title and the day of its passage. Held, that proof of the usual formalities of the passage of an ordinance over the mayor's veto, though there was no written entry of its publication, was a sufficient showing of the publication to admit the ordinance in evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 281-289; Dec. Dig. ☞122.]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞122—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Proceedings for the assessment of property for street improvements being in invitum, defendant's proof, in the usual manner, of the existence of an ordinance preserved in the city's official records, as the true act of its common council purporting to cast upon the city the burden of paying for the work, casts upon the city or the person seeking to deny its liability, the burden of showing facts invalidating the ordinance.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞365—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ACCEPTANCE OF STREET—SUFFICIENCY OF ORDINANCE.

Under Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 160) § 20, providing that whenever any street has been fully constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and of the city council, and is in good condition throughout, it shall be accepted by the city council by ordinance, and thereafter be kept in repair and improved by the city, the expense thereof to be paid out of the fund to be provided therefor, and that the council shall not accept any part of the street less than the entire width of the roadway, including the curbing, an ordinance providing for the acceptance of a roadway as a public street, reciting the construction of the street to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and the city council, was not invalid because it omitted the word "fully" before "constructed," or the phrase "in good condition throughout"; and, where it did not specifically mention the curbing as a part of the roadway accepted, the omission did not make the ordinance invalid, as the curbing, for the purpose of acceptance, was included within the definition of the term "roadway," and the exception of part of the street which, under Civ. Code, § 498, a railroad was bound to keep in order, did not invalidate the ordinance.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞365—ACCEPTANCE OF STREET—VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE—DATUM PLANE.

The fact that no datum plane had been established and officially adopted by the city of Oakland prior to its adoption of an ordinance accepting an avenue as a public street, with the liability of thereafter keeping it in repair and improved, was immaterial to the force and validity of the ordinance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 898; Dec. Dig. ☞365.]

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞488, 489—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—OBJECTION TO ASSESSMENT—ESTOPPEL.

Where a city by ordinance had accepted an avenue as a public street, and had the right to order its improvement, an abutting owner who remained silent when the work was being done and presented no objection was not estopped from contesting the contractor's right to collect from him after the work was completed; and, further, the doctrine of estoppel has no application in proceedings to enforce liens for street work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1147-1152; Dec. Dig. ☞488, 489.]

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ☞266—STREET IMPROVEMENTS — LIENS — CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS—REPEAL.

Vrooman Act, § 20, providing that, whenever any street has been fully constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and of the city council and is in good condition throughout, it shall be accepted by ordinance, and thereafter be kept in repair and improved by the city, in respect to the exemption of property owners from liability for improvements, was not repealed by Const. art. 11, § 6, as amended in November, 1896, freeing cities and towns in all "municipal affairs" from any further subjection to or control by general laws, since without words indicating a retroactive operation the statute was not thereby repealed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; F. B. Ogden, Judge.

Action by the Barber Asphalt Paving Company against Charles Jurgens. Judgment for defendant, new trial denied, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Snook & Church, of Oakland (J. A. Cooper, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, amicus curiae. Mortimer Smith, of Oakland (Chapman & Trefethen, of Oakland, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial. The action was to foreclose the lien of a street assessment for work on San Pablo avenue, in the city of Oakland. The findings of the court were in substantial compliance with the defendant's answer, and, in brief, were to the effect that the contract between the superintendent of streets and the plaintiff was made before the expiration of ten days after the posting and publication of the notice of award of contract; that the contract as recorded was different from the one actually signed, the lands within the district described in the recorded contract never having been subjected to an estimate as required by law; and that San Pablo avenue was an accepted street when the contract for the work was let. If the finding last mentioned be correct, and if the force and effect attributed to it by the court be warranted, we need not consider the other findings which are questioned by the appellant, because in that event we must hold that land of defendant abutting on San Pablo avenue was not subject to assessment for street work. The finding with reference to the ordinance accepting San Pablo avenue is as follows:

"That on the 4th day of February, A. D. 1889, the said city council of the said city of Oakland, by Ordinance No. 1071, entitled 'An ordinance providing for the acceptance of the roadway of San Pablo avenue from its intersection with the westerly line of Broadway to the northern boundary line of the city of Oakland,' duly accepted said San Pablo avenue as a public street, and that ever since said 4th day of February, A. D. 1889, the said San Pablo avenue was and now is an accepted public street of the said city of Oakland."

Appellant attacks the ordinance mentioned in the finding quoted above upon several grounds. Certain informalities in the adoption of the ordinance are discussed in the briefs and are said by appellant to be fatal to its validity. By the terms of the by-law that portion of the roadway "required by law to be kept in order or repair by any person or company having railroad tracks thereon" is excepted from the city's acceptance. This, according to appellant's views, was an unlawful deviation from the powers of the city. The ordinance purports to accept the "roadway" of San Pablo avenue, and the alleged failure to include the curbing in that designation is relied upon by plaintiff as a fatal defect therein. The ordinance is also attacked because it contains no recital that the part of San Pablo avenue sought to be accepted had been fully constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and of the city council. Appellant also condemns the ordinance because at the time of its adoption no datum plane had been officially adopted by the city of Oakland, and no official grade had been established thereon. As a consequence, it is argued, the work approved and adopted was, in contemplation of law, no improvement at all. The argument is also advanced that by the change in the Constitution giving cities full control over "municipal affairs" the status of San Pablo avenue, established by the mandate of a general statute, ceased to be of any avail as against the city of Oakland, which was not bound by a condition which by a declaratory ordinance the city had recognized as being in existence; and, furthermore, that the city after the said amendment to the Constitution was not bound, under the law, to refrain from assessing property abutting on San Pablo avenue for the improvement of that street. It was also urged against the position of respondent that by failing to appeal to the city council for relief because of the existence of "Ordinance No. 1071" he waived his defense based thereon, and is estopped upon principles of equity from setting it up in this action.

Section 20 of the general street law (St. 1885, p. 160) is substantially as follows:

"Whenever any street * * * has been or shall hereafter be fully constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and of the city council, and is in good condition throughout, and a sewer, gas pipes and water pipes are laid therein, under such regulations the city council shall adopt, the same shall be accepted by the city council, by ordinance, and thereafter shall be kept in repair and improved by the said municipality; the expense thereof, together with the assessment for street work done in front of city property, to be paid out of a fund to be provided by said council for that purpose: Provided, that the city council shall not accept of any portion of the street less than the entire width of the roadway (including the curbing), and one block in length, or one entire crossing. * * * The superintendent of streets shall keep in his office a register of all streets accepted by the city council under this section, which register shall be indexed for easy reference thereto."

The court found the history of the passage of the ordinance as follows:

"Said ordinance was passed on the 7th day of January, 1889, and from the minutes of the city council of said city it appears that on the 21st day of January, 1889, the mayor of said city vetoed said ordinance, whereupon the consideration of the same was made a special order for the next regular meeting of said city council, to wit, February 4, 1889, upon which last-named date the city council of said city of Oakland, by a vote, did not sustain said veto of said mayor, but at that time and place said city council of said city passed said ordinance, six councilmen voting in the affirmative, and one councilman voting in the negative, and that at said time seven members constituted the city council of the said city of Oakland."

Appellant makes the point that the ordinance was not "reconsidered" and passed over the mayor's veto, but we think the records of the city council do show that the action of the council was substantially a reconsideration and passage of the by-law.

[1] There was no formal proof of the publication of the ordinance as required by law (St. 1862, p. 353, § 53) but there was proof of all of the usual formalities of the passage of an ordinance over the mayor's veto. Mr. Thompson, the city clerk, testified that the exhibit which was received in evidence was the original record. Evidently there was no written entry of the publication of the ordinance. Respondent's counsel contend that formal proof of publication was not a prerequisite to the admission of the ordinance in evidence. In this behalf he quotes from the opinion written by Mr. Justice Van Fleet in Santa Rosa City R. Co. v. Central Street Ry. Co., 4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 950, 38 Pac. 988. That opinion is not authoritative, for the reason that the case was reheard and the judgment was affirmed by reason of a failure of the court to agree. Originally Justices McFarland and Fitzgerald concurred in the opinion of Justice Van Fleet, and Justice Garoutte concurred in the judgment, while Justices Harrison and De Haven dissented. After a change in the personnel of the court, Justices Van Fleet, Garoutte, and McFarland adhered to their belief that the judgment should be reversed for the reasons given in Justice Van Fleet's opinion, while Justices Henshaw, Harrison, and Temple were of the opinion that it should be affirmed. As the Chief Justice was disqualified, the judgment stood affirmed by reason of the failure of a majority of the Associate Justices to agree. It does not appear, however, that the matter of failure to prove publication of the ordinance and Justice Van Fleet's discussion of that phase of the case caused the diversity of views. Santa Rosa City Railroad v. Central Street Railway Co., 112 Cal. 436, 44 Pac. 733. In the opinion of the dissenting Justices (4 Cal. Unrep. Cas. 964, 38 Pac. 992) their dissent is based solely upon their belief that a forfeiture of plaintiff's franchise occurred by reason of its failure to complete its road within the prescribed time. Therefore, while the opinion published in the Pacific Reporter does not stand as an authoritative declaration of the law on this subject, we think it is worthy of adoption upon the point here involved. Before quoting from said opinion it may be well to refer to the provisions of the charter of Oakland existing at the time of the passage of the ordinance. It was provided that:

"All ordinances shall be published by written advertisements posted up at the mayor's office and at three other public places in the city or in a newspaper published in the city." St. 1862, p. 353.

Also that:

"Every ordinance passed by the city council shall be presented to the mayor for his approval; if he approve, he shall sign it; if not, he shall return it within five days thereafter, or if the city council be not then in session, at its next meeting, when said city council shall reconsider said ordinance; and if approved by two-thirds of all the members elected to such board, it shall take effect and stand as an ordinance of the city." Stats. 1862, p. 342, § 8.

There was no provision as in the Santa Rosa charter that proof of the passage and publication of ordinances might be made in "the usual way," but section 61 of the Practice Act (the predecessor of section 459, Code Civ. Proc.) was then in force, and under it one seeking the advantage of an ordinance might plead it (and consequently prove it prima facie) by referring to it by its title and the day of its passage. This was "the usual way"; consequently, the language of the learned justice in the Santa Rosa Case, which we quote below, is entirely applicable to the condition presented by this record. He said:

"There can be no doubt that publication in a newspaper or by posting is made by that statute a condition precedent to the taking effect of any ordinance; but it does not follow that direct proof of that fact is essential in any case. The statute expressly allows the passage and publication of ordinances to be proved 'in the usual way'; that is, by such proof as would be sufficient to prove such facts in any other case. * * * As was said in City of Atchison v. King, 9 Kan. 550, 556: 'The city having passed the ordinance four or five years before it was offered in evidence, and, having acted upon it as valid, will not now be allowed in such an action to deny its publication. Such a rule would be a great inducement to cities to disobey the law. They get the benefits and escape the inconveniences of the law by such a course, as it would in most cases be impossible for a stranger to prove a publication four or five years after the passage of the ordinance, when the publication is by posted notices. Nor would the difficulty be much less where it was published in a newspaper, in a country where newspaper changes are as frequent as they are in this state. It was the duty of the city authorities to publish the ordinance. As they acted on it, the presumption is that it was duly published; and at least this presumption is sufficient till the contrary appears.'"

In Van Buren v. Wells, 53 Ark. 377, 14 S. W. 38, 22 Am. St. Rep. 214, it was held that the burden of proving publication was not placed upon the person asserting a right under the statute, but upon the one denying its validity. See, also, Muir's Adm'rs v. City of Bardstown, 120 Ky. 750, 87 S. W. 1093; Missouri Pacific Ry. Co. v. Chick, 6 Kan. App. 482, 50 Pac. 605; McQuillin, Municipal Corporations, § 864.

[2] Proceedings for the assessment of property for street improvements being in invitum, it follows that after the defendant has proven, in the usual manner, the existence of an ordinance preserved in the city's official records as the true and genuine act of its common council, purporting to cast upon the city the burden of paying for the work, facts tending to invalidate such ordinance must be proven by the city or the person seeking to deny the city's liability.

[3] But appellant attacks the ordinance on ground that it fails to recite that the work on San Pablo avenue had been fully constructed to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and of the city council, or that the street was in good condition throughout. The ordinance does recite the construction of the roadway to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets and the city council. The omission of the word "fully" before "constructed" we deem not important. Satisfaction sufficient to cause the councilmen to vote to accept the street must be regarded as full satisfaction for all practical purposes. There was no recital that at the date of the passage of the ordinance the street was "in good condition throughout." It is argued that, where the jurisdiction of an inferior tribunal depends upon facts to be ascertained by such tribunal, its records must affirmatively show the existence and determination of such facts. Bedell v. Scott, 126 Cal. 675, 59 Pac. 210, and similar cases are cited in support of this position, and appellant asserts that a finding of the good condition of the road was not only a prerequisite to acceptance, but that such finding must be recited in the ordinance in order to give validity to that enactment. The doctrine announced in Bedell v. Scott has been somewhat modified by the later decision in Gardella v. County of Amador, 164 Cal. 561, 129 Pac. 993. This court said in Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 369, 80 Pac. 81:

"Where a legislative body is given power to act whenever it shall find a given fact to exist, it is not necessary, as a condition to the exercise of the power, that such body should previously or contemporaneously make a declaration that the fact exists. The fact that it takes the action raises the presumption that it had upon inquiry ascertained the existence of the fact, unless the statute giving the power explicitly requires an express finding or declaration of the conditions precedent."

Section 20 of the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 160) does not require that an ordinance accepting a street should show upon its face that the street was "in good condition throughout." Therefore the omission of that recital from the ordinance did not nullify its force and effect.

In the ordinance in question that part of the street which, according to law, was required to be kept in order by a railroad company was excepted from the operation of the by-law, and the curbing was not specifically mentioned as a part of the "roadway" which the city accepted. Both of these omissions are specified by appellant as fatal to the efficacy of the ordinance. Beaudry v. Valdez, 32 Cal. 276, is cited as authority for the proposition that curbing may not be considered a part of the "roadway." That case merely holds that the term "macadamizing" does not include "curbing." Section 20 of the Vrooman Act was evidently drawn with the intention of specifying curbing as a part of the roadway, because the city is therein inhibited from accepting any portion of the street "less than the entire width of the roadway (including the curbing)." The curbing is therefore, for the purposes of the act, included within the definition of the term "roadway," and an acceptance of a "roadway" in compliance with that section is an acceptance of the whole of the roadway, including the curbing. Nor did the exception from the ordinance of that part of the street which the railroad company is bound to repair make the ordinance a nullity. It is consistent and proper to read section 20 of the Vrooman Act in connection with section 498 of the Civil Code. While it is true that the former statute requires the council to accept the entire roadway, if any part, it is equally true that for the purposes of street assessment the zone which the railroad company is bound to keep in repair is not a part of the roadway. In San Francisco Paving Co. v. Egan, 146 Cal. 638, 80 Pac. 1076, which was an action to foreclose the lien of a street assessment, the board of supervisors had in the resolution of intention specifically excepted "that portion required by law to be kept in order by the railroad company having tracks thereon," although the statute only authorized the omission of those portions of the street on which work previously had been performed by owners of land fronting thereon. It was held that the board of supervisors had the right to except in its resolution that part of the street which the railroad company was bound under its franchise to keep in order. While Oakland Paving Co. v. Rier, 52 Cal. 276, is in seeming conflict with this conclusion, we are not favored with the text of the resolution of the council there reviewed. The opinion merely says that the council did not accept the full width of the street. The resolution was also held of no effect under section 20 of the Vrooman Act, because it sought to express acceptance of work done, rather than of the street upon which the material and labor had been bestowed.

[4] Because no datum plane had been established and officially adopted by the city of Oakland prior to the adoption of Ordinance No. 1071, appellant insists that the attempted acceptance of San Pablo avenue was beyond the power of the city council. It is true that without a datum or basis fixed for the grade of a street a contractor may not know how far he may be compelled to go in filling or grading, and therefore it is proper that a grade should be fixed before the letting of public contracts for street work. But this is not a question between the city and a contractor or a prospective bidder whose rights are in danger of being violated because of the nonexistence of an official grade. When a municipality engages with the owners of property to keep the roadway of a street in repair, it makes such engagement in view of the existing facts, and the existence or nonexistence of an official datum plane is entirely immaterial to the force and validity of its ordinance of acceptance.

[5] It is also suggested that respondent's failure to appeal to the council for relief estopped him from maintaining this defense, that, being presumed to know of the existence of the ordinance, he remained silent while the work was being done, and the failure to present his objections and his defense to the city council precluded him from an assertion of such defense before any other tribunal. But the presumption of knowledge did not attach to the respondent with any greater strength than it applied to the city or to the contractor. What could the council have done to remedy the situation? It could not have removed the effect of the ordinance. The council had the right to order the improvement, and the property owner could not question that right, but he could contest the contractor's right to collect from him after the work was completed. In Flickinger v. Fay, 119 Cal. 590, 51 Pac. 855, the facts were these: The common council of the city of San Jose had ordered certain work done on a street, and had entered into a contract with the respondent, but the appellant, who owned property abutting on the street, sought by injunction to restrain prosecution of the improvement on the ground that he would be charged with a proportion of the cost in violation of a resolution of the council by which the street had been accepted in accordance with the provisions of the street improvement act. This court held that the injunction was properly denied and said, among other things:

"Whether the cost of that work shall be borne by the city, or be assessed upon the adjacent lands, will be determined after the work under the contract has been completed. If, for any reason, an assessment therefor cannot be legally made upon the lands of the plaintiffs, they will then be entitled to relief against such procedure, or can successfully defend any proceeding to enforce the assessment."

Besides, it has been held that the doctrine of estoppel has no application in proceedings to enforce liens for street work. Heft v. Payne, 97 Cal. 110, 31 Pac. 844; Union Paving & Contracting Co. v. McGovern, 127 Cal. 639, 60 Pac. 169.

[6] In opposition to the superior court's conclusion that no lien could attach upon the property for the improvement made, for the reason that at the time the contract was made San Pablo avenue was an accepted street, we are favored with an elaborate brief by one of the amici curiae wherein it is argued that no exemption existed by reason of the ordinance provisions. In support of this contention counsel insists that section 20 of the Vrooman Act, before its repeal in 1911 (which was subsequent to the completion of the work here considered), created no vested or contractual right when it was complied with, and that the exemption therein provided for was a mere gratuity, revocable at the will and pleasure of the power bestowing the gratuity. The question whether or not exemptions of this sort create a contractual relation has been twice before this court, but it was not decided either time. San Francisco v. Certain Real Estate, 42 Cal. 521; Oakland Paving Co. v. Rier, supra. Generally speaking, however, the principles of taxation are not those of contract, and it has frequently been decided in other jurisdictions that payment by a property owner for improvements to a street in no wise constitutes a consideration moving from him to the city which would support a contractual obligation. See Ladd v. City of Portland, 32 Or. 271, 51 Pac. 654, 67 Am. St. Rep. 526, and cases cited. On the other hand, there are authorities which hold that, where an assessment has been made under powers properly exercised, and has been duly paid, a second assessment should be borne by the general public for the reason that the benefits to the owner of abutting property of such second improvement is reduced to a minimum, and that, the real benefit being to the community generally, the municipal treasury should bear the burden. Hammett v. Philadelphia, 65 Pa. 146, 3 Am. Rep. 615. The principle upon which owners of abutting property are charged with the cost of street improvements, in the first instance, is that their property is benefited in a special manner. In recognition of this doctrine, statutory provision is often made for exempting property from the operation of an assessment where a prior improvement has been ordered and constructed, or for the giving of some credit for the value of such prior improvement, and when such exemption or credit has been ordered in conformity with statute or ordinance, it has usually been sustained. The policy of the Legislature of this state has been to recognize that the special benefit which an abutting owner has received by reason of street improvements has been satisfied by the payment of one assessment, and that under a second improvement an owner of property abutting thereon does not derive any advantage beyond that enjoyed by all other citizens. Section 20 of the Vrooman Act is a legislative recognition of a right to exemption which ought to exist under all conditions of fairness and justice. Irrespective of the question of what rights might or might not accrue under the exemption, it is admitted that the section provides for the creation of a certain status by the adoption of an ordinance of acceptance, and that the moment this status is brought into existence the sovereign power of the state operates, through the act, to create an exemption. It is contended, however, that while this exemption continued to exist after the adoption of a freeholders' charter, the provisions of which were consistent with the Vrooman Act, this situation was changed in November, 1896, by the amendment to section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution, under which cities and towns theretofore or thereafter organized, and the charters of such cities and towns, were freed in all "municipal affairs" from any further subjection to or control by general laws, and that upon the adoption of the amendment the freeholders' charter became exclusively operative in matters of street improvements and acceptance, and that accordingly any exemption created under general laws became extinguished. In support of this theory it is argued that to hold otherwise would have the effect of interfering with the power of taxation by the city, by increasing the burden on the general taxpayers by reason of the fact that the exemption would augment the area of land relieved from assessment for street purposes by acceptances under section 20 of the Vrooman Act. This contention cannot be maintained. The delegation of exclusive authority by constitutional provision to municipalities in municipal affairs does not of itself have the effect of repealing all general laws with reference to such affairs. Rights existing under a statute in force when a constitutional amendment is adopted are not affected by it, unless it contains some provision which specifically abrogates such pre-existing rights. 1 Page & Jones on Taxation, § 166. Unless intent to repeal the terms of a special law is evident from the language of a constitutional provision, courts should assume as a rule of construction that only a prospective operation of the constitutional provision was contemplated. State ex rel. Harrison v. Frazier, 98 Mo. 426, 11 S. W. 973. Constitutional provisions do not affect laws in existence unless the words employed show a clear intention that the provisions shall have a retroactive effect. Mest- as v. Diamond Coal & Coke Co., 12 Wyo. 414, 76 Pac. 567; Hamilton on Assessments, §§ 196, 201, note. The constitutional amendment here invoked to defeat the asserted exemption contains no such provision, nor was any ordinance ever adopted, under this grant, so far as this record discloses, attempting to revoke the exemption provided for in the Vrooman Act and declared by the ordinance of the city of Oakland which we have been here reviewing. Both the act and the ordinance having been in force at the time of the improvement for which plaintiff seeks payment from defendant, it follows that, as the street had been duly accepted, the assessment was void.

Our conclusion with reference to this branch of the case makes it unnecessary for us to discuss the other alleged errors.

The judgment and order from which plaintiff has appealed are affirmed.

Dissenting Opinion June 3, 1915.)

1. WITNESSES ⇌ 201—PRIVILEGE—ATTORNEY AND CLIENT—"COMMUNICATION."

An attorney who had been employed by certain clients to represent them in matters connected with the investigation of election frauds, and who appeared to defend three other individuals who were indicted for such frauds and put up a cash bail for one of the indicted men, cannot be compelled to state to the grand jury the names of the clients who employed him to represent the three indicted men, and who furnished the cash for the bail, under Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5, requiring an attorney to maintain inviolate the secrets of his client, and section 1881, providing that an attorney cannot, without the consent of his clients, be examined as to any communication made by the client, "communication" in that section not being restricted to mere words but including acts as well.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

In bank. Application by George McDonough for a writ of habeas corpus for his discharge from custody on the sentence for contempt of court. Petitioner discharged.

A. L. Frick and Burton Jackson Wyman, both of Oakland, for petitioner. W. H. L. Hynes, Dist. Atty., and Walter J. Burpee, Chief Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Oakland, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Petitioner, an attorney at law, was retained by one Woolley and one Gorman to represent them as their attorney in connection with any and all investigations that were being made, or that might be made as to their participation in certain alleged election frauds and violations of the election laws in Alameda county, claimed to have been committed in connection with the general primary election of August 25, 1914, and he has ever since been acting as their attorney in pursuance of such employment. Subsequent to such employment one Higgins, one Gale, and one Wiles were indicted by the grand jury of that county, charged with participation in said crimes alleged to have been committed in connection with such election. Petitioner appeared as the attorney of each of such men, and has ever since acted for them, having admittedly been employed to represent them. He deposited $10,000 cash bail for the release of Higgins. Subsequently the grand jury of Alameda county, in the further investigation of said frauds and crimes, procured the attendance of petitioner as a witness, and while he has finally answered many questions put to him, he has steadily refused to answer such questions as these, viz:

Q. Who employed you to represent Higgins et al.? Q. Did Jack Woolley or Grant Gorman employ you to represent Higgins et al.? Q. Did Jack Woolley or Grant Gorman furnish the $10,000 which you deposited as bail for Higgins? Q. Who furnished the $10,000 deposited as bail for Higgins?

For his refusal to answer these questions after being ordered to do so by the superior court, petitioner has been adjudged guilty of contempt of court, and ordered confined in the county jail of Alameda county until he does answer them. Admittedly the purpose of the questions is to obtain evidence against Woolley and Gorman, by which they can be implicated as principals in the commission of the crimes for which Higgins et al. had been indicted, and to implicate them in the commission of the election frauds.

The court below found that all the allegations of petitioner's affidavits filed in the contempt proceedings are true. These affidavits averred substantially, among other things, the following: Each and every communication, either verbal, written, or by signs, which he had received from either Woolley or Gorman in any way, relating to or concerning or about the said frauds, or the charges on which Higgins et al. were indicted, or with reference to the defense or bail of either said Higgins or said Wiles or said Gale, were received by him as the attorney for said Woolley, and as the attorney for said Gorman, and not otherwise. That the $10,000 deposited as bail for Higgins was delivered to him by a client of his, which client had previously employed him to represent him, said client, in all investigations which were being or might be made of said client's conduct in connection with said alleged election frauds and in connection with Higgins et al., and to represent him in all matters and things growing out of the alleged election frauds in which it was or might be claimed that said client was implicated, and in any proceedings whereby it might be sought to ascertain whether the said client was connected with the commission of these crimes or not. That clients employed him to represent Higgins et al., and that these clients had previously employed him to represent them in connection with all charges which might be brought against them in connection with said frauds, and in reference to any claim that might be made that these clients had in any way been connected with these frauds, and that it was in connection with such employment by said clients to act as their attorney, and not otherwise, that these clients employed him to represent Higgins et al. That neither the unnamed clients nor Woolley nor Gorman consented to his testifying.

[1] The question presented is whether the employment of petitioner by his clients to defend Higgins et al. and the furnishing by his clients of the sum of $10,000 to bail out Higgins were matters concerning which he cannot testify without the consent of such clients. Section 1881 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

"There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate; therefore, a person cannot be examined as a witness in the following cases: * * * 2. An attorney cannot, without the consent of his client, be examined as to any communication made by the client to him, or his advice given thereon in the course of professional employment."

However desirable it may be to obtain proofs sufficient to insure the conviction of all persons who commit crimes of the character of those under investigation, and it will readily be conceded that it is most desirable, such proofs may not be obtained from those who are forbidden by our law to give them. In regard to the obligations of an attorney to his client in this respect, our statutes are very explicit, making it his duty "to maintain inviolate the confidence, and at every peril to himself, to preserve the secrets of his client" (Code Civ. Proc. § 282, subd. 5), and, in the section above quoted, prohibiting his examination as a witness, as therein stated. As said in People v. Atkinson, 40 Cal. 284:

"On principles of public policy, communications from a client to his attorney, touching the subject-matter under investigation are privileged, and will not be allowed to be disclosed by the attorney, even though he be willing to do so."

It is obvious, of course, that the sole purpose of the questions was to obtain from petitioner proof of admissions by a client to him, tending in some degree to show complicity on his part in the alleged crimes for which Higgins et al. had been indicted, made while he was acting as the attorney of such client in the very matter of said alleged crimes. Under the circumstances shown here, the questions could have no other purpose, and the answers no other effect. It will at once be conceded that if this client had said to such attorney that he had aided and abetted Higgins et al. in the commission of the acts for which they had been indicted, under such circumstances of course as to preclude the idea that his statement was not confidential, the attorney could not be examined as a witness regarding such statement, in view of our law, without the consent of the client. To our minds there is absolutely no distinction in principle between such a case and that presented by the questions which it is here sought to compel petitioner to answer. The only difference is in the weight of the testimony as going to show such complicity on the part of the client, in the one case being a direct admission of such complicity, and in the other being an admission of interest from which, in the light of other circumstances, such complicity might reasonably be inferred.

It has been said that the word "communication" as used in such provisions as our section 1881, Code of Civil Procedure, is not to be restricted to mere words uttered by the client, that looking back at the reason of the privilege it is seen to secure the client's freedom of mind in committing his affairs to the attorney's knowledge, and that acts, as well as words, may fall within the privilege. See Wigmore on Evidence, § 2306; State v. Dawson, 90 Mo. 149, 1 S. W. 827; Holden v. State, 44 Tex. Crim. 382, 71 S. W. 600. These statements, we are satisfied, are in accord with the reason of the rule, and we cannot doubt their correctness. The questions here called for "communications" from petitioner's client or clients to him. In view of the facts found by the lower court, it cannot here be doubted either that whatever information was conveyed to petitioner thereby came to him from his clients in the ordinary course of his professional employment as such clients' attorney, or that there was nothing in the nature of the transaction, or in matters extraneous thereto, to rebut the presumption that the communications were confidential. See Hager v. Shindler, 29 Cal. 67.

[2] And there was nothing in the facts to warrant a conclusion that the evidence proposed to be thus adduced bore at all upon any intention or arrangement on the part of the client to perform some illegal act in the future, or the then actual doing of any such illegal act, as to which, it may be conceded, the rule would not apply, however injurious to the client the evidence might be. See United States v. Lee (C. C.) 107 Fed. 702. There was nothing illegal or contrary to public policy in what it was proposed to show petitioner's clients had done in the way of employing petitioner to defend Higgins et al., or in furnishing the money to be used for the purpose of obtaining the release of Higgins on bail. As before suggested, it was simply being attempted to show by petitioner's testimony that the clients had made to him admissions from which, in the light of other circumstances, their guilt in the matter as to which petitioner was defending them, might be inferred.

We are unable to perceive any sufficient ground upon which it may be held that petitioner may be compelled, without his client's consent, to answer any of these questions. Counsel for the people rely, as to the questions directed to the identity of the persons who employed petitioner to defend Higgins et al., upon what has frequently been said to the effect that an attorney is not privileged from disclosing by whom he was employed. Ordinarily this is doubtless true. As is said by Wigmore in his work on Evidence (section 2313), the identity of the attorney's client, or the name of the real party in interest, will seldom be a matter that can be held, under the law, to have been communicated in confidence. The mere fact of retaining an attorney to act as such is not ordinarily a matter occurring in the course of the confidential relation of attorney and client, but is something that precedes the establishment of that relation. Eickman v. Troll, 29 Minn. 124, 12 N. W. 347. Frequently, too, the fact of employment of an attorney by a certain person for a specific purpose is an element of the cause of action being asserted against such person in the matter under investigation. This is illustrated in the case of White v. State, 86 Ala. 69, 5 South. 674, and Stanley v. Stanley, 27 Wash. 570, 68 Pac. 187, cited by counsel for the people. In the first of these cases, White was charged with making a false claim against a railroad company for lost baggage, and evidence of an attorney, employed to present the claim and who presented it, as to his employment, was held admissible. The other case was an action for damages by a wife against her husband's parents for alienation of her husband's affection, and the testimony of an attorney that he was employed by the parents to bring an action for divorce on the part of the husband against the wife was held to be proper. As Mr. Wigmore says, much ought to depend on the circumstances of each case. The matter was discussed in In re Shawmut Min. Co., 94 App. Div. 156, 87 N. Y. Supp. 1059, and it was substantially said that many cases holding that an attorney may be compelled to testify to his representation of some person as an attorney are based and decided upon the principle that the employment and communications were made for the purpose of enabling the attorney to perform acts which involved the rights of third parties, who acted upon the faith of his attorneyship, and that under such circumstances it was entirely proper that the fact of attorneyship should be established. Of course, we have nothing of this kind here. The case of United States v. Lee (C. C.) 107 Fed. 702, perhaps comes nearer to sustaining the claim of the attorneys for the people than any other case cited, but even that case is distinguishable in a material way. The grand jury was investigating the matter of the disappearance of Lee, who had become a fugitive from justice while under indictment and awaiting trial, and his attorney, who had appeared for him on the indictment, was compelled to testify as to the name of the person who had employed him to defend Lee; it appearing that some one other than Lee himself had employed him. As suggested, the grand jury was investigating the matter of his disappearance, and not the question of his guilt of the charge against him—was endeavoring to ascertain who, if anybody, was guilty of complicity in the flight of Lee, an illegal act occurring after the commission of the crime charged against Lee. Even as to this the district judge said that a question asked the attorney relative to the interest which his client had in the defense of Lee might involve a confidential communication from his client to himself, and might therefore be improper. He further said:

"If the client did have an interest and stated it to his counsel, the latter is not called upon to reveal it."

But the judge thought that counsel could not state that he gained the information called for from a client and then leave that client mysterious, unknown, and undefined, and that the court had a right to know that the client was actual flesh and blood, and—"to demand identification for the purpose at least of testing the statement which has been made by the attorney who places before him the shield of this privilege."

Of course, in view of the facts found by the trial court here, no such reason exists in this case. It is clear enough that none of the various reasons advanced in the authorities for the disclosure of the name of the client who employed the attorney is applicable here, in view of the circumstances of this case. We cannot escape the conclusion that, in view of the findings of the lower court, to require the petitioner to answer any of the questions as to the name of the client who employed him to defend Higgins et al. would be to require him to divulge a confidential communication made to him by a client in the course of his employment—a communication tending to show, and, under the circumstances of this case, material only for the purpose of showing, an acknowledgment of guilt on the part of such client of the very offenses on account of which the attorney had been employed to defend him.

What we have said is also true as to the questions relative to the furnishing of the money deposited as bail for Higgins.

The petitioner is discharged from custody.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. In my opinion the judgment of contempt should be upheld.

There is in the commitment, and made a part thereof, a full record of the proceedings before the grand jury, and the superior court, which includes the two affidavits each of A. K. P. Harmon, foreman of the grand jury, and the petitioner. This record merits a critical examination. I will consider the questions relating to employment and bail separately.

On the question of employment I will examine, first, whether the superior court found that before petitioner was employed to represent Higgins, Gale, and Wiles, he had already been retained on behalf of the party or parties who so employed him, and in this connection the inquiry is apart from the question of the identity of such party or parties.

It was, of course, necessary for petitioner to show such order in the respective employments as a foundation for the claims of privilege, and he sought to show it in an indirect and, as I think, ineffective way.

In respect to Higgins and Gale it is alleged that he was employed prior to October 19th, and Wiles prior to November 16th, but there is a striking absence of any averment covering the exact date of his employment on behalf of the three men.

In regard to the date that he was retained by those who employed him to represent Higgins et al., it is plainly averred that Woolley and Gorman engaged him separately as their individual attorney on October 17th. There is, however, no allegation in terms that before petitioner was employed to act for Higgins et al., he had been retained by Woolley and Gorman on their own account. But such prior employment is attempted to be established by several indirect averments. For instance, it is alleged that anything "which may have been said" to petitioner by either Woolley or Gorman about the cases against Higgins, Gale, and Wiles, or representing them, was communicated while the relation of attorney and client existed between Woolley and Gorman and petitioner, and not otherwise.

It is elsewhere averred that petitioner had been employed by "clients" of his, without stating their names or how many such clients there were. Then follows the direct allegation (which is absent from the averments wherein Woolley and Gorman are mentioned by name) that before the "clients" employed him on behalf of Higgins, Gale, and Wiles they employed him to represent them. And in succeeding paragraphs it is averred in sequence that Woolley and Gorman were and are "clients" of petitioner. It was apparently intended to further supplement the suggestion of prior employment by Woolley and Gorman for themselves personally by the averments that ever since October 19th and November 16th, respectively, petitioner has represented the three men. No liability of disclosure touching the question as to who employed him on behalf of Higgins et al., would have been incurred by stating when he was so employed. Such jugglery with facts should not be tolerated, and especially as the direct averment on the point of time would not, as has been shown, have impaired the asserted claims of privilege so far as the identity of either Woolley or Gorman or the unnamed "clients" is concerned.

As to the legal effect of all the averments on this point, it is proper to state that before pronouncing the judgment of contempt the superior court made the following general findings:

"The court finds that each and every averment in the affidavits filed with this court by A. K. P. Harmon and the said George McDonough, and made a part of this commitment, and each and every recital in the orders made thereon by this court, and made a part of this commitment, is and are true. * * *"

It is the established law of this state that on habeas corpus the findings of fact of the superior court are binding on this court. Ex parte Clark, 110 Cal. 405, 42 Pac. 905; Ex parte Spencer, 83 Cal. 460, 23 Pac. 395, 17 Am. St. Rep. 266; Ex parte Sternes, 77 Cal. 156, 19 Pac. 275, 11 Am. St. Rep. 251; and Ex parte Ah Men, 77 Cal. 198, 19 Pac. 380, 11 Am. St. Rep. 263.

The court made no findings of any specific fact otherwise than as above expressed or implied, and in the involved state of the evidentiary record it cannot even be conjectured what conclusion, if any, was reached on the question whether the relation of attorney and client existed between Woolley and Gorman and petitioner before he was employed to represent Higgins et al., and this question was vital to the claims of privilege; for, I repeat, if the relation had not been previously formed, there could be no privilege.

It must be shown that the relation of attorney and client actually existed before any communication can have the sanctity of privilege. 40 Cyc. 2363b; Churchill v. Corker, 25 Ga. 479; Jennings v. Sturdevant, 140 Ind. 641, 40 N. E. 61; State v. Smith, 138 N. C. 700, 50 S. E. 859; Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 633, 22 Pac. 26, 131; George v. Silva, 68 Cal. 272, 9 Pac. 257. In State v. Smith, supra, the prisoner had made communications prior to the employment to one whom he claimed to be his attorney in fact. But the court overruled the objection and held that, even if it had been shown that the recipient of the communication was an attorney at law at the time, "the prisoner could not deprive the state of such important evidence by 'retaining' the witness." The fact of employment is preliminary in its nature and is not involved by the rule of privilege.

It is clear that the petitioner had primary knowledge of the precise date of his employment on behalf of the three men, and his failure to allege the fact, and relying on ambiguous and indirect averments instead, may have led the court, under a familiar rule of evidence (subsections 6 and 7, § 2061, Code Civ. Proc.), to find that there had been no such prior employment, for, in strictness, prior to October 19th or November 16th may be prior to October 17th. And, as already pointed out, fixing the exact date of the employment did not involve the main question as to who employed him. The allegation that "anything which may have been said" of course is not the equivalent of a statement that anything was said. In this behalf I think the reference in the majority opinion to the subject that any communication petitioner "had received" is too strongly expressed. Nor has any attempt been made, except by suggestion, to establish identity between Woolley and Gorman and the unnamed "clients," notwithstanding the direct averment that Woolley and Gorman were "clients" of petitioner. Indeed, the court may have decided that there was no such identity. Nor, again, does the averment that ever since the indicated dates petitioner has represented Higgins et al. preclude the idea that he may have represented them prior to October 17th. Evidence of such equivocal import should have been ignored for every purpose, and in my opinion, it cannot be availed of to annul the judgment of the superior court. It seems to me there is an evidentiary gap between the set of averments which refer to Woolley and Gorman by name and the allegations touching the unnamed "clients," and as neither is sufficient, in itself, by reason of vagueness, to cover the point of time, it cannot be held here that the superior court found the fact in favor of petitioner.

Tested by the averments of priority of employment, the crime of perjury could not be supported if, as a matter of fact, petitioner was employed to represent Higgins et al. before October 17th.

Finally if petitioner intended by circumlocutory averments to have the superior court assume or find that Woolley and Gorman were the "clients" referred to, then his assertions of privilege should not be further considered.

In my view, the superior court did not intend by its findings to hold that the petitioner met the burden of showing that the relation of attorney and client had previously existed between himself and those who employed him at the time he was retained to represent Higgins, Gale, and Wiles. But even if it must be held here that under the findings of the superior court the employment on behalf of Higgins et al. was after, instead of before, October 17th, the fact of the employment itself should have been divulged by the petitioner.

Following the findings, the superior court concludes:

"That none of the averments contained in any of the affidavits, or answer, filed by George McDonough, and made a part hereof, state facts sufficient to justify the refusal of the said George McDonough to answer the questions hereinafter referred to, and no reason appears why the said George McDonough should not be compelled to answer such questions before the grand jury of Alameda county, and why he should not be punished for refusing to do so in contempt of an order of this court issued on the 8th day of December, A. D. 1914, and made a part thereof."

The grand jury was organized on November 2d. Prior to October 19th the preceding grand jury had returned indictments against Free S. Beach and James Higgins for the crimes of forgery and violating section 113 of the Penal Code, Edward C. Wiles for perjury, false registration, fraudulent voting, and falsification of a public record, and Charles L. Gale for forgery and violating the provisions of sections 46 and 113 of the Penal Code. What remained to investigate called for the faithful and diligent efforts of the grand jury and the district attorney. The initiatory affidavit of the foreman, referring to the first appearance of the petitioner before the grand jury, enumerates the foregoing indictments, and avers:

"That said matters and said criminal action and actions grew out of and were based upon certain fraudulent registration, voting, falsification of records, and impersonation of voters that had been committed in the said county of Alameda on the 25th day of August, A. D. 1914, at the general primary election held pursuant to the provisions of the direct primary law; that said crimes and frauds against the elective franchise shows a general concerted plan, scheme and conspiracy; * * * that * * * said grand jury was investigating the above matters with a view of determining what person or persons planned and directed the execution of said frauds and crimes, and who were in league and in conspiracy with the above-named defendants in the execution and perpetration of said election frauds and the above-mentioned crimes."

The investigation, the petitioner was apprised by the district attorney, covered the range of offenses prescribed by chapter 4, pt. 1, of the Penal Code, which is devoted to crimes against the elective franchise, and embraces sections 40 to 61½, the latter making applicable to primary elections the provisions of the preceding 24 sections. In addition, as already appears, indictments had been found against Higgins and Gale for violations of section 113 of the Penal Code, which relates to the stealing, destroying, mutilation, altering, falsifying, and the like of records in the custody of a public officer.

It is averred by the petitioner on his information and belief that the inquiry concerning his employment on behalf of the three men was immaterial and irrelevant, and that the purpose of the district attorney in asking the questions was to implicate Woolley and Gorman and the so-called "clients." Whether the court found in favor of these averments does not appear by any specific finding. But it is proper to consider in this connection, as well as with regard to the legal conclusions of the superior court, that a grand jury is an appendage of the superior court, and its members officers thereof (In re Gannon, 69 Cal. 541, 11 Pac. 240; Heard v. Pierce, 8 Cush. [Mass.] 338, 54 Am. Dec. 757); that they are "persons specially invested with powers of a judicial nature" (title 3, pt. 1, Code Civ. Proc.); and that "the grand jury must inquire into all public offenses committed or triable within the county, and present them to the court by indictment" (section 915, Pen. Code).

While the subject-matter of investigation by a grand jury must fall within the original jurisdiction of the superior court as to the grade of offenses, and the inquiry be clearly defined when the authority of the superior court is invoked by it to compel a witness to answer, yet because of the inquisitorial nature of the powers of the grand jury, it is not requisite that the court shall be fully advised of the exact evidentiary import of the proposed evidence, nor that it shall be informed of every angle and turn of, or keep pace with the investigation, or who may be involved thereby. It must affirmatively appear, however, that the inquiry is within the general scope of the investigation, and that the subject-matter thereof is not in excess of the cognizance of the grand jury.

A full investigation of the matters referred to in the affidavits of the foreman of the grand jury was of transcending importance to the public and to the administration of justice, for crimes of the character mentioned tend to sap the foundations of free government and subvert the will of the people in the exercise of their electoral rights. It is readily conceivable that the inquiry had many ramifications, a close knowledge of which would properly be confined to the grand jury and to the district attorney, and I cannot assent, therefore, to this statement in the prevailing opinion:

"* * * It is obvious, of course, that the sole purpose of the questions was to obtain from petitioner proof of admissions by a client to him, tending in some degree to show complicity on his part in the alleged crimes for which Higgins et al. had been indicted, made while he was acting as the attorney of such client in the very matter of said alleged crimes."
* * *

This excerpt assumes the existence of facts about which, as I have shown, there is serious doubt. But even if by "client" is meant Woolley or Gorman, or both, or the unnamed "clients," the fact of petitioner's employment on behalf of Higgins et al. should have been divulged, whether the questions had the import alleged by petitioner or tended to the effect described in the opinion. The test as to whether a communication is privileged is not the effect the disclosure may have either on the client or the attorney, but whether the communication comes within the rule of privilege, and this question must inevitably be determined by the facts and circumstances of each particular case.

The reasons calling for the identification of the client are set forth in Wigmore on Evidence, § 2313, and I cannot conceive of a criminal case where the privilege is urged that the fundamental fact of employment may not be inquired into. The questions of employment and the privilege claimed are in their essence interdependent, and each must be determined according to the accepted rules governing them.

The general doctrine of privileged communications is expressed in the following cases:

"* * * There is no presumption of privilege, and though its allowance may, in a clear case, be founded upon the voluntary statement of the attorney that his knowledge of the fact of which he is asked to testify was acquired in professional confidence, yet wherever the circumstances suggest that the sufficiency of the grounds of that statement should be considered, it is the right of the opposing party to demand that the proponent of the privilege shall be submitted to such interrogation as may be necessary to test its validity." Section 748a, Jones on Evidence; In re Ruos (D. C.) 159 Fed. 252; People's Bank of Buffalo v. Brown et al., 112 Fed. 652, 50 C. C. A. 411; and Hughes v. Boone, 102 N. C. 160, 9 S. E. 286.

"* * * It was incumbent on the party who objected to the examination * * * to show that the communication was privileged. * * *" Carroll v. Sprague, 59 Cal. 659.

"The burden is on the party seeking to suppress the evidence to show that it is within the terms of the statute." Sharon v. Sharon, 79 Cal. 677, 22 Pac. 26, 131.

"Authorities establish the rule that the attorney may be compelled to disclose the character in which the client employed him."

"* * * It is further to be observed that, as this rule has a tendency to prevent the full disclosure of the truth, it ought to be strictly construed." Satterlee v. Bliss, 36 Cal. 508.

"Whether or not the circumstances are such as to make the rule of privilege applicable in a particular case is a question for the court." 23 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 71, citing cases.

And " * * * as the rule of privilege has a tendency to prevent the full disclosure of the truth, it should be limited to cases which are strictly within the principle of the policy that gave birth to it." Id., citing Satterlee v. Bliss, supra, and other authorities.

The general principle of privileged communications is laid down in Wigmore on Evidence, § 2285 (4):

"The injury that would inure to the relation by the disclosure of the communications must be greater than the benefit thereby gained for the correct disposal of litigation."

And see section 2332.

In U. S. v. Lee (C. C.) 107 Fed. 704, referred to in the majority opinion, it is said:

"But it is thought that a counsel may not state that he gained the information called for from a client, and then leave that client mysterious, unknown, and undefined. The court has a right to know that the client whose secret is treasured is actual flesh and blood, and demand his identification, for the purpose, at least, of testing the statement which has been made by the attorney who places before him the shield of this privilege."

The question arose there, as here, in an investigation before a grand jury, and in the light of the evidentiary record in the case at bar the language is peculiarly pertinent, since the range of the questions touching the employment of petitioner on behalf of Higgins et al. was limited to the identity of the party or parties who so employed him, and did not call for a disclosure of any communication received after such employment was entered into.

I apprehend there is no division of opinion on the general subject of privileged communications. When the relation of attorney and client has been created, and the object of the employment is not in furtherance of any criminal or fraudulent purpose (Jones on Ev. § 748 and Wig. on Ev. § 2298), any communication made by one to the other "during, in the course of, and for the purposes of such employment" (section 748a, Jones on Ev.) is privileged, and "it is immaterial whether the client is or is not a party to the action in which the question is put to the legal adviser." (Id.). It is the privilege of the client, and not of the attorney, and the communication shall not be disclosed by the latter without the express consent of the former.

In determining in any case the pivotal question whether the relation of attorney and client had been created before the communication passed, the inquiry should be as broad as the necessities of the particular case, in order to get at the truth of the matter. And if the prior existence of the relation is not established, the communication lacks in privilege.

I shall assume again for the purposes of what is to follow that the superior court found that the relation of attorney and client existed at the time the petitioner was employed on behalf of Higgins et al. by "clients"—Woolley and Gorman or others—whose secrets he is guarding by his refusal to testify, and now consider whether, as matter of law, upon the record of the proceedings from the superior court, the communications referring to the employment to represent the three men come within the rule of privilege. My conclusion is that they do not, and this rests on two considerations: First, that the fact of employment in criminal litigation is never privileged; and, second, that even if the privilege may attach to the fact of employment in criminal proceedings in some instances, yet under the peculiar circumstances shown by the record from the superior court, not only the fact of employment, but also the "characterizing circumstances," should be fully developed.

The question whether the fact of employment may always be inquired into in civil litigation whenever the claims of privilege are urged, upon considerations affecting the rights of third parties, or otherwise, is not involved here. But I perceive no reason for any difference in the rule. It may be suggested, however, that the rights of the public are not so immediately concerned in civil as in criminal litigation, and hence in relation to crimes against the state there would, in my opinion, always be stronger reason for having the identity of the interested parties known.

I have pursued the subject at length in order to ascertain, if possible, the reasoning the superior court followed in the premises, for it found without qualification in favor of all the averments of fact and held nevertheless that petitioner had placed himself in contempt of its authority, and it is our duty not to pronounce the judgment void except in the face of the strictest necessity.

In my examination of the law I found no case on the subject of contempt of court whose facts bear resemblance to those of the proceeding at bar, and it is because of the unusual state of the facts that I finally conclude the superior court made a finding on the entire evidentiary record—although it does not so specifically appear therein—to the effect that because of the peculiar circumstances surrounding the employment of petitioner on behalf of Higgins et al. the communications on the subject should not receive the sanction of privilege. I do not think the court could have reached any other conclusion.

According to the claims of the petitioner, before being retained for the three men, he had been employed by certain "clients," Woolley and Gorman or others, to represent them individually in any matter that might arise out of the election crimes and frauds. From certain averments in the affidavit of petitioner it was doubtless inferred by the court that the employment to represent the "clients" came as a result of prevalent rumors and articles that appeared in the public press, tending to connect them with the crimes claimed to have been committed by Higgins et al. The employment for the three men followed. The purpose of that particular employment primarily, of course, was to defend the original "clients."

I have given particular attention to the record of the said proceedings, with the view of determining the conclusion the court must have reached in reference to the character of the services the petitioner was to perform for the three men. It readily occurs that under all the circumstances presented there might well be an adversity of interest between the two sets of clients, and, of course, if that were so, the law would not support the petitioner in attempting to represent both.

The court could not have done justice to the state, as well as to the petitioner, if it failed to keep in mind the common experience in the administration of criminal justice that, in relation to crimes involving conspiracy and confederation, those who plan them remain in the background, while reckless tools are sent forth to do the actual work under promises of reward, protection, and defense. If exposure follows, the men who actually committed the criminal act are alone brought to the bar of justice. Then an attorney, chosen by the heads of the enterprise, appears to defend them. Deference is generally paid to appearances by having one attorney for each individual. If conviction follows, the leaders in the background are naturally anxious about the outcome. Will the district attorney be able to obtain confessions from the men already in the toils of the law, and, in that way, develop all the facts of the crime and reach out for the prime conspirators? In such circumstances the advantage of hiring an attorney to guide the criminals already in the clutches of the law can hardly be exaggerated. What would be the conception of duty on the part of an attorney who would, in such a situation, accept employment to represent the two sets of malefactors? This is not an unusual experience by any means, as every one familiar with criminal litigation is aware.

If the superior court applied the foregoing illustration to the strange facts and circumstances of this case, and then in judging petitioner's conduct reached the conclusion that Woolley and Gorman were original conspirators in the scheme to debauch the election, and Higgins et al. were merely tools to do the actual work, would it be expected, under any rule of law, that the communications in relation to the employment of petitioner on behalf of Higgins et al. should be held privileged? The inherent circumstances plainly suggest that there were two such classes of participants in the enterprise—one in the conception and the other in the commission of the election crimes and frauds.

How are the interests of justice to be safeguarded if an attorney is permitted to form such divergent alliances? To illustrate: If, in the progress of the investigation or prosecution, it seemed to be for the mutual benefit of the state, and the involved men that, upon considerations of mitigation or immunity, the latter make to the authorities disclosures covering the criminal enterprise to violate the election laws on a wholesale scale, would the petitioner be in a position to give disinterested advice to his clients in the open in the face of his personal employment for the "clients" in the dark? If such practices are to be tolerated, then assuredly an attorney under the cover of his professional status could, with assurance of security, be guilty of conduct which would be reprehended by the law if committed by another.

An attorney is required to take the constitutional oath of office to faithfully discharge the duties of an attorney and counselor at law to the best of his knowledge and ability (section 278, Code Civ. Proc.), and his duties are prescribed by law (section 282, Id.), among which are:

" * * * (4) To employ, for the purpose of maintaining the cases confided to him, such means only as are consistent with truth, and never seek to mislead the judge or any judicial officer by an artifice or false statement of fact or law;

"(5) To maintain inviolate the confidences, and at every peril to himself, to preserve the secrets of his client."

On the record here it is proper to inquire, Whose confidence would the petitioner maintain, and whose secrets would be preserved? It is idle to think that Woolley and Gorman or the "clients" employed petitioner on behalf of Higgins et al. simply for the purpose of securing an adequate defense for them, for the whole record is at war with any such suggestion. The superior court must have concluded that the real purpose was nearer to the individual anxieties of the original clients. If these reflections are warranted, then the petitioner was involved in a conflict of duty, in which, considering the circumstances of the employment, the interests of the three men would probably be subordinated to those of the others; and if this be so, the petitioner has doubtless been more concerned in the proceedings about the nature of his engagement to represent Higgins et al. than he was over the prospect of the disclosure of the fact of the employment itself. If petitioner were retained by Woolley and Gorman or the unnamed clients to protect them at all hazards, then, in my opinion, he was not free to accept employment to represent the three men, and this points to the necessity of showing "the characterizing circumstances" in such a case. The dual employment is disturbing, no matter from what angle it may be viewed, and in such circumstances the law should frown upon the relation, for to sanction it is to leave the law weaker and to place a premium on unethical conduct, or something more serious. It is not to be held that the law is susceptible of such stultification.

No client, in the suggested situation of the petitioner's original "clients," is entitled to the services of an attorney for the collateral purpose indicated here, and an attorney should not be permitted to be so employed, and if he would guard his professional honor and standing, and value his own liberty, he would not be willing to be.

Upon the remaining question whether the petitioner should have been compelled to state the source from which he obtained the bail money, I am not free from doubt. The petitioner, we have seen, stated unequivocally that he had been employed separately by Woolley and Gorman on October 17th, and that before the "clients" engaged him for Higgins et al. they retained him for themselves. It was stipulated between petitioner and the district attorney that the bail money was deposited on October 19th.

If the court found that the "clients" were identical with Woolley and Gorman, and that petitioner was employed to represent Higgins prior to October 19th, then under the rule governing the findings of the superior court on habeas corpus it would be proper to conclude here that the bail was deposited for Higgins during the existence of the relation of attorney and client between him and the petitioner, and upon this theory the point as to how the employment was brought about would lose some of its importance when considered in connection with the question of bail. This view proceeds on the assumption that in regard to the bail, communications passed between petitioner and Higgins as well as the petitioner and the "clients" who furnished the bail. The depositing of bail by an attorney on behalf of his client in the due course of employment would ordinarily be deemed a communication between attorney and client within the meaning of privilege, but there may be some question in this case whether the superior court found it was a communication for the "purposes of such employment."

However, as already stated, on the question of bail I entertain some doubt, which I shall resolve on the side of the petitioner. People v. Atkinson, 40 Cal. 284.

Applying the rule of decision on habeas corpus (In re Shortridge, 5 Cal. App. 371, 90 Pac. 478), to the record and the law on the question of employment, I am of opinion that the writ should be dismissed, and the petitioner remanded.

1. WILLS ⚡456—CONSTRUCTION.

The words of a will are to be taken in the ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 974; Dec. Dig. ⚡456.]

2. WILLS ⚡467—CONSTRUCTION—TESTAMENTARY DISPOSITIONS—"DESIRE."

Civ. Code, § 1322, provides that a distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or by any other words not equally clear, or by inference from other parts of the will, or by an inaccurate recital of, or reference to, its contents in another part of the will. A will provided: "I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley. If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother." Held, that the word "desire" indicated the wish of testatrix regarding the disposition of the property, and was a dispositive and testamentary provision, binding upon the court in the distribution of the estate, so that, where the daughter survived the testatrix and died unmarried, the property was to be distributed to the brother and sisters of the testatrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 954, 986; Dec. Dig. ⚡467.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Desire.]

3. WILLS ⚡675—TESTAMENTARY TRUST—PRECATORY WORDS.

Such provision was a command sufficient to effect a testamentary disposition of the property, and not an expression of a wish or preference directed to the daughter, so that there was no precatory trust reposed in her.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1587-1589; Dec. Dig. ⚡675.]

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Martha L. Tooley. From a decree of distribution, the brother and sisters of the decedent appeal. Reversed.

Frank Freeman, of Willow, for appellants. Glenn West, Ben F. Geis, and Durard F. Geis, all of Willow, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The transcript presents an appeal by the brother and sisters of the decedent from a decree of the superior court making distribution of her estate. The sole question presented is the construction of the last will of the decedent. The will reads as follows:

"I give all my property at my death to my daughter Logan Mattie Tooley. If at her death she has neither husband or children I desire any property that may be left divided equally among my sisters and brother."

"Martha L. Tooley."

The daughter, Logan Mattie Tooley, survived her mother, the testatrix, but died before the petition for distribution was filed. She also left a will by which she gave all her property to Leonard Lenus Klemmer, subject to a small annuity. She was unmarried at the time of her death, and had no children. Letters of administration with the will annexed were granted upon her estate. In the petition for distribution of the mother's estate the executor asked that distribution thereof be made to the brother and sisters of Martha L. Tooley. The administratrix of the daughter's estate filed an opposition to this petition, and asked that distribution be made to said administratrix for the benefit of the estate of said Logan Mattie Tooley. The court denied the petition for distribution, and sustained the opposition thereto. Distribution was made accordingly to the administratrix of the estate of the daughter for the benefit of said estate.

The contention of the respondents is that the first paragraph of the will vests the estate of the property of the mother absolutely in the daughter, Logan Mattie Tooley, and that the second paragraph is ineffectual to change this disposition. They rely upon the rule set forth in section 1322 of the Civil Code. It is as follows:

"A clear and distinct devise or bequest cannot be affected by any reasons assigned therefor, or by any other words not equally clear and distinct, or by inference or argument from other parts of the will, or by an inaccurate recital of or reference to its contents in another part of the will."

The argument is that the words of the second paragraph of the will are not as clear and distinct as those of the first paragraph, and, consequently, that they cannot affect the clear and distinct devise and bequest contained in the first paragraph. The basis of this argument is that the word "desire," in the second paragraph, is not to be taken as a positive disposition of the property, but only as an expression of a wish or preference directed to the devisee Logan Mattie Tooley. We are of the opinion that this position is untenable.

[1] The words of a will are to be taken in their ordinary and grammatical sense, unless a clear intention to use them in another sense can be collected.

[2, 3] The second clause of the will, if taken alone, would constitute a clear disposition of the remainder at the death of the testatrix to her brothers and sisters. The rule is practically universal that words in a will indicating the wish of the testator regarding the disposition to be made of her property by the law at her death are to be taken as a dispositive provision. The correct rule is clearly stated in Board v. Culp, 151 Pa. 470, 25 Atl. 118, as follows:

"Where, however, words of recommendation, request, and the like are used in direct reference to the estate, they are prima facie testamentary and imperative, and not precatory. * * * Should the testator say merely, 'I desire A. B. to have one thousand dollars,' it would be as effectual a legacy as if he was expressly to direct, or will it, or were to add, 'out of my estate,' or that it should be paid by his executor. The reason is obvious. A will, in its * * * nature, is the disposition which the testator desires to have made of his estate after his death. All the expressions indicative of his wish or will are commands. It is different when, having made a disposition, he expresses a desire that the legatee or devisee should make a certain use of his bounty."

In Estate of Marti, 132 Cal. 671, 61 Pac. 965, the court, upon this subject, said:

"While the desire of a testator for the disposition of his estate will be construed as a command when addressed to his executor, it will not, when addressed to his legatee, be construed as a limitation upon the estate or interest which he has given * * * in absolute terms."

In the Tooley will the words of the second clause are, in the sense here referred to, "addressed to the executor," and are mandatory.

The respondents here deny that there is either a precatory trust or disposition of the remainder. The Marti Case establishes beyond question that there is here no trust. The result would be that the second clause would be wholly ineffectual, which is contrary to the rule of section 1325 (Civ. Code) that a will is to be so interpreted as to give some effect to every clause, rather than so as to render any expression inoperative.

The proposition that words expressing desire or wish, when directed to the estate, and not to some devisee with respect to the property received by such devisee, are to be deemed as dispositive expressions evincing the will of the testator with respect to the property, is thoroughly well established. In Estate of Wood, 36 Cal. 80, the will began as follows:

"I wish five thousand dollars to go to John C. Cole, in the event of my dying intestate."

Notwithstanding the use of the word "intestate," the court held that this constituted a will, saying:

"It clearly fills the definition of a will given by approved writers on that branch of the law, viz.: 'The declaration of a man's mind as to the manner in which he would have his property or estate disposed of after death.'"

To hold otherwise, the court remarked, would be to assert that he went through the solemn form of executing such an instrument for no purpose whatever. The following cases declare that the word "desire," or other similar expression, when used to declare the disposition to be made of property at the death of the testator, and not as a request or prayer directed to a devisee or legatee concerning such devise or legacy, is a dispositive command, testamentary in character, and not precatory, but a positive direction binding upon the court in the distribution of the estate: Barney v. Hayes, 11 Mont. 571, 29 Pac. 282, 28 Am. St. Rep. 495; McMurry v. Stanley, 69 Tex. 231, 6 S. W. 412; Stewart v. Stewart, 61 N. J. Eq. 28, 47 Atl. 633; Webber v. Bryant, 161 Mass. 403, 37 N. E. 203; Appeal of Philadelphia, 112 Pa. 474, 4 Atl. 4; Meehan v. Brennen, 16 App. Div. 395, 45 N. Y. Supp. 58; Taylor v. Martin (Pa.) 8 Atl. 922; Oyster v. Knull, 137 Pa. 448, 20 Atl. 624, 21 Am. St. Rep. 890; Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 111; Wood v. Camden, etc., Co., 44 N. J. Eq. 460, 14 Atl. 885; Phillips v. Phillips, 112 N. Y. 205, 19 N. E. 411, 8 Am. St. Rep. 737.

In view of these authorities it cannot be said that the words of the second paragraph of the will are not equally clear and distinct as those of the first paragraph. We think no case can be found in which a will indicating a disposition of property by the word "desire" or "wish" has been held not to be sufficient to constitute a will. The meaning of the word, when used in such connection in a will, is as clear as that of any other word in the language.

The decisions upon the question whether or not words of recommendation, entreaty, or desire directed to a devisee or legatee asking or enjoining a disposition of the thing devised or bequeathed are precatory words sufficient to establish a trust, or are mere expressions leaving the matter to the discretion of the devisee or legatee, have no bearing upon this case. Such questions arise only when the request is made, or from the context is construed to be made, to the devisee or legatee. Where the words are used to describe a disposition of property, that is, where they are directed to the executor or to the law, and not to a devisee or legatee, the authorities are uniform that the word is sufficient to declare a disposition of the property. The second paragraph of the will is not directed to Logan Mattie Tooley at all, but is a clear statement that, upon her death without husband or children, whatever of her mother's estate then remains is to be divided equally among the sisters and brother of Martha L.

Tooley. For these reasons, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in making the decree complained of.

We concur: SLOSS, J.; LAWLOR, J.

PER CURIAM. Rehearing denied.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent from the order denying a rehearing. To my mind it is correctly stated in the petition for rehearing that the theory of the department opinion apparently is that words which may properly be held sufficient to show a primary or direct devise of property will necessarily be sufficient to qualify or cut down an absolute estate in the same property given in unequivocal language by a preceding provision of the will. Such a theory, I think, finds no support in the authorities. The question is not whether such words as are used in the second paragraph of the will here involved would be taken as a positive disposition by the testatrix of the property referred to, if they were the only words in the will relative to such property, but whether, considered in connection with the words of the first paragraph referring to the same property, and clearly and distinctly devising an absolute estate therein, they show an intent on the part of the testatrix to limit the effect of the disposition made by such paragraph. In the determination of this question, section 1322 of the Civil Code is applicable. I am of the opinion that the judge of the lower court was correct in his conclusion that the words used in the second paragraph with relation to this property are "not equally clear and distinct" as those used in the first paragraph, that, considered in connection with the first paragraph, they fail to show any intention on the part of the testatrix that her daughter should take less than an absolute estate, and that they should be considered as nothing more than the expression of a wish or desire on the part of the testatrix, addressed to her daughter.

In re HASKINS' ESTATE. (L. A. 4107.) (Supreme Court of California, May 28, 1915.)

1. TAXATION $\S$ 905—INHERITANCE TAX—APPRAISAL OF ESTATE—STATUTES.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 1444, providing for the appointment of appraisers of estates in probate, and under the Inheritance Tax Law (St. 1911, p. 713), the controller names one or more inheritance tax appraisers in each county. The court in probate names three disinterested appraisers for each estate in probate, of which one must, and the others may, in the court's discretion, be selected from the authorized inheritance tax appraisers within the county; and if the inheritance tax appraiser fails to act as one of the probate appraisers, the expense of making the inheritance tax appraisement must be paid out of the estate, and not out of the inheritance tax fund.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 1728-1731; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 8905.]

2. TAXATION $\S$ 895—INHERITANCE TAX APPRAISER—DUTIES—STATUTE.

Under the inheritance tax law (St. 1911, p. 713), the duty of an inheritance tax appraiser is to report on the character and probable value of so much of the estate as is liable to the tax, and to determine whether transfers of property have been made by the deceased of a nature rendering the transferred property liable to the tax.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. $\S$ 1714-1721; Dec. Dig. $\S$ 895.]

3. TAXATION $\S$ 895 — INHERITANCE TAX — PROCEEDINGS FOR ASSESSMENT.

Under inheritance tax law (St. 1911, p. 713), where the probate court entertained a petition for the distribution of an estate, which erroneously alleged that no inheritance tax was payable thereon, whereupon the court settled the executor's account and distributed the estate to him, from which decree the controller of the state appealed on the ground that there was an inheritance tax due, and that the legal steps had not been taken to assess such tax, upon which appeal the court, by a nunc pro tunc order, corrected the decree of final distribution by finding that an inheritance tax of $27.67 was due the state, which was ordered paid, and was tendered to the county treasurer, who refused it, the refusal of the treasurer was justified, since the inheritance tax law contemplates notice and a hearing of the report of an inheritance tax appraiser, and determination of the amount of tax by the court after such hearing, and authorization to the county treasurer to receive the tax, when such proceedings have been had, while the ex post facto order of the court attempting to amend its decree could not cure its radical omissions of appraisal, etc.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Laura J. Haskins, deceased. From a decree settling the account of George M. Haskins as executor, and distributing the whole of the estate to such executor free of any inheritance tax, the controller of the state appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Robert A. Waring, Inheritance Tax Atty., of Sacramento, and John W. Carrigan, Asst. Inheritance Tax Atty., of Los Angeles, for appellant. Harry B. Washburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. By the will of Laura J. Haskins, deceased, all of her estate was given to her stepson, George M. Haskins. This will was duly admitted to probate, and all probate proceedings thereunder were regularly had and taken. The time came when the estate was ready to be closed, and George M. Haskins, above named, who was also the executor of the estate, filed his final account and report and therewith his petition for distribution. It was set forth, and on the hearing shown, that the estate consisted of $1,055.39 in money; that there were no offsets against this amount for claims or credits or disbursements. Erroneously the petition declared that no inheritance tax was chargeable or payable upon the inheritance of George

M. Haskins, or upon any of the property of the estate. Thereupon the court settled the final account and distributed the whole of the estate to George M. Haskins. From this decree the controller of the state appealed, upon the ground that there was an inheritance tax due to the state, and that the steps prescribed by law had not been taken in the matter of the appraisal of such inheritance tax, and that the decree of distribution made no award to the state of such a tax. Following the taking of this appeal the court, by a nunc pro tunc order corrected the decree of final distribution, the correction consisting in a finding that an inheritance tax of $27-67 was due the state of California; that this sum was "in open court" ordered paid; "that said executor tendered the amount of said inheritance tax to the county treasurer of the county of Los Angeles on the 7th day of October, 1914" (the day upon which the original decree of final distribution was made); and that the county treasurer refused to receive this sum.

It is not in question but that the amount of the inheritance tax which the court thus decreed is the amount justly due to the state under the law. Inheritance Tax Law 1911, §§ 2-4 (Stats. 1911, p. 713, et seq.). The procedure, however, which the court adopted, it is urged, is so at variance with the law governing the matter as to call for a reversal, with directions to the court in probate to proceed in conformity with that law. To the method of procedure laid down we are thus brought.

Section 1444 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it originally stood, made provision for the appointment of three appraisers, any two of whom may act, and who perform the familiar function of appraisers of estates in probate. As amended in 1911, that section now prescribes that the judge must appoint of the three probate appraisers one who is an inheritance tax appraiser. Section 14 of the Inheritance Tax Act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1076) provides that the state controller shall appoint—

"one or more persons in each county of the state to act as inheritance tax appraisers therein. Every such inheritance tax appraiser (in addition to any fees paid him as appraiser under section 1444 of the Code of Civil Procedure) shall be paid by the county treasurer out of any funds that he may have in his hands on account of said tax, on presentation of a sworn itemized account and on the certificate of the superior court, at the rate of five dollars per day for every day actually and necessarily employed in said inheritance tax appraisal, together with his actual and necessary traveling and other incidental expenses, and the fees paid such witnesses as he shall subpoena before him, which fees shall be the same as those now paid to witnesses subpoenaed to attend in courts of record; provided, that in any probate proceeding in which the executor or administrator shall have failed to have had the inheritance tax appraiser act as one of the appraisers under section 1444 of the Code of Civil Procedure and to have paid him his fees therefor, the expense of making the inheritance tax appraisal in this act provided for shall be paid out of said estate, and the executor or administrator thereof shall be liable for said fee."

Section 16, subdivision "a" of the same act, declares that:

"When any superior court having jurisdiction in probate of the estate of any decedent, or a judge of such court, shall, in accordance with section 1444 of the Code of Civil Procedure, appoint the appraiser or appraisers in said section provided for, said superior court or judge thereof shall also at the same time designate and appoint an inheritance tax appraiser (unless such designation and appointment be previously made) to ascertain and report to said superior court the amount of inheritance tax due upon any property passing in said probate proceeding, or a lien thereon, or upon any other property transferred within the meaning of subdivision 3 of section 2 of this act, to any person, institution or corporation, taking property under and by virtue of said probate proceedings, together with such other additional information as shall assist said court in the determination of said tax. * * * Upon the completion of his inheritance tax appraisal in any probate proceeding, the inheritance tax appraiser shall make a report in writing to the superior court of the clear market value of the several interests in the estate of the decedent, and shall report the amount of inheritance or transfer tax chargeable against, or a lien upon such interests, acquired by virtue of said probate proceedings or by any transfer within the meaning of this act to any person, institution or corporation acquiring any property by virtue of said probate proceedings, together with such other facts as may advise the court in regard thereto, or which the court may require, and may return to said superior court such depositions as he may have had reduced to writing, exhibits, or other testimony or information taken before him, or submitted to him."

Under subdivision "b" of the same section the appraiser is required to mail a copy of his report to the state controller and—

"the clerk of said superior court shall forthwith give notice of such filing to all persons interested in such proceedings, by posting, and in addition thereto shall forthwith mail to the state controller and to the county treasurer, and to all persons chargeable with any tax in said report who have appeared in such proceeding, a copy of said notice. At any time after the expiration of ten days thereafter, if no objection to said report be filed, the said superior court may give and make its order confirming said report and fixing the tax in accordance therewith. At any time prior to the making of said order, any person interested in said proceeding (including the state controller or the county treasurer) may file objections in writing to said report. Thereupon said superior court shall, by order, fix a time, not less than ten days thereafter, for the hearing thereof, and shall direct the clerk of said superior court to give such notice thereof as it shall deem necessary; provided, that a copy of such notice and of such objections shall be forthwith mailed to the state controller, county treasurer and inheritance tax appraiser. Upon the hearing of said objections, said court may make such order as to it may seem meet and proper in the premises."

Section 17 deals with the proceedings which shall follow the inheritance tax appraiser's disclosure that a transfer of property of the decedent has been made, the property affected by which transfer being subject to an inheritance tax. Further provisions of the act authorize the reception by the county treasurers of the amount of the tax when determined in accordance with the law.

[1] With these provisions before us (and they are thus elaborately set forth, not because of their consequence in this litigation, but because the state has asked a definition of the powers and duties of our courts in probate), we may briefly sum up the matter. The controller names one or more inheritance tax appraisers in each county. The court in probate names three disinterested appraisers for each estate in probate. Of these appraisers in probate, one must, and the others may or may not (within the discretion of the court in probate) be selected from the list of authorized inheritance tax appraisers within the county. There is no compulsion in the law upon the court in probate to appoint more than one inheritance tax appraiser as a probate appraiser. It does become the duty of the probate court, under section 16, to appoint, however, an inheritance tax appraiser. His duties and functions are quite independent and apart from those of the probate appraisers. The law in this regard prescribes merely that if the inheritance tax appraiser shall have failed to act as one of the probate appraisers, the expense of making the inheritance tax appraisal shall be paid out of the estate and not out of the inheritance tax fund under the control of the county treasurer. As a matter of economy, therefore, the executor or administrator may well see that such inheritance tax appraiser acts in the matter of the inventory and appraisal of the estate. But, again, we repeat, there is no compulsion in the law that this shall be done, the penalty for a failure so to do being fixed by section 14 of the statute as above set forth. We may, in this connection, however, anticipate the law by calling attention to the fact that by an amendment to section 1441 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which amendment becomes operative on or about the 7th of August next, it will become the duty of the court in probate, not only to appoint an inheritance tax appraiser as one of the three probate appraisers, but the probate appraisal itself can be made by two of those three appraisers only in event that the inheritance tax appraiser is one of the two. St. 1915, c. 197.

[2] While the appraisers in probate report upon the character and probable value of all the properties of the estate, the duties of the inheritance tax appraiser are essentially different. He is to report upon the character and probable value of so much of the estate as is liable for the inheritance tax, and, still further, he is to determine whether transfers of property have been made by the deceased of such nature as to render the property transferred liable to the inheritance tax. Estate of Reynolds, 147 Pac. 268.

[3] Furthermore, the law contemplates notice and a hearing of the report of such inheritance tax appraiser, a determination by the court after such hearing, and an authorization to the county treasurer to receive the inheritance tax when such formal proceedings have been taken. The state itself may justly be heard to complain if the course prescribed by its own law is not followed, and it is not a sufficient answer to say that in the individual case no wrong has resulted. Judicially we cannot upon this bench know whether error has been committed and wrong has resulted until after the formal hearing and determination so plainly prescribed by the law. The treasurer, therefore, was justified in refusing to receive this money in settlement of the inheritance tax of the estate in the absence of a decree of the court in probate fixing the amount of that tax. The order of the court amending its decree could not avail to cure these radical omissions.

The decree appealed from is reversed, with directions to the trial court to pursue, in the matter of the closing of the estate, the course prescribed by law.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by S. J. Prince and another against William J. Hill and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. B. Rosendale and C. F. Lacey, both of Salinas, for appellants. J. H. Andresen, of Salinas, and W. S. White, of Beaumont, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The record presents an appeal from an order denying the defendants' motion for a new trial.

The plaintiffs sued to foreclose a lien for work done and materials furnished by them to the defendant, Whitcomb, in the erection by Whitcomb of a building upon the land of the defendants, William J. and Isabelle A. Hill. The contract between Whitcomb and the Hills was for more than $1,000, and, although in writing, was not recorded. It was therefore void with respect to lien claimants.

The plaintiffs agreed with Whitcomb to do the carpenter work and furnish certain materials for the building for the sum of $820. It is alleged that certain extra work was done and additional materials furnished, at Whitcomb's request, of the value of $183.66, and that there remains unpaid of these two sums a balance of $217.66. Judgment was given declaring and foreclosing a lien on the land for this amount.

[1] Upon the trial, the court below admitted evidence, over the defendants' objection, tending to show that the value of the materials furnished and work done for Whitcomb by the plaintiffs, upon the building, was greater than the agreed price thereof. In admitting this evidence the court below stated that the plaintiffs were entitled to a lien for the value of such work and materials, although such value exceeded the contract price for which they had agreed with Whitcomb to do and furnish the same. In these rulings the court erred. Even with regard to the contract between the owner and the original contractor, the decision in Rebman v. San Gabriel, etc., Co., 95 Cal. 395, 30 Pac. 564, to the effect that the original contractor may recover more than his contract price, where such contract is void under the statute, has long been overruled, and such recovery is limited to the contract price. Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 176, 65 Pac. 391; Marchant v. Hayes, 117 Cal. 669, 49 Pac. 840; Sullivan

v. California R. Co., 142 Cal. 203, 75 Pac. 707; Condon v. Donahue, 160 Cal. 754, 118 Pac. 113. Much less should the subcontractor, the validity of whose contract is not in the least affected by the provisions of the mechanics' lien law, recover for a value in excess of his agreement with the original contractor. It has never been so held, and the contrary has been decided. Jewell v. McKay, 82 Cal. 150, 23 Pac. 139; Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 179, 22 Pac. 509, 6 L. R. A. 588. In Jewell v. McKay, referring to the provision of section 1183, C. C. P., that where the original contract is void, the labor done and materials furnished upon the building by others than the original contractor "shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof," the court said:

"It cannot possibly have been the intention that a contractor, materialman, or laborer, who agrees for a certain sum, can have a lien for a greater sum upon the ground that the value of what he furnished is greater. * * * We think that the word 'value,' in the above provision, is to be construed so as to mean 'agreed value' in cases where there is an agreed value."

This expresses the true intent of the above provision, as applied to the point in question.

Our attention is called to the decision of the district court of appeal in Panama, etc., Co. v. Tingey, 147 Pac. 585, decided February 17, 1915, in which that court apparently held that under the statute requiring contractors for street work to give a bond to secure to laborers and materialmen the value of work done and materials furnished for the improvement, the actual value of the work or materials is the measure of the recovery and not the amount agreed upon. We need express no opinion as to the soundness of this opinion as applied to the street work law. It is of no binding force as an interpretation of the mechanic's lien law, and, so far as the latter is concerned, it is contrary to our own decisions, which are paramount in authority to those of the District Court of Appeal.

[2] But although the court admitted this evidence, its finding was not based upon it. The findings set forth the subcontract and state that the value of the work done and materials furnished thereunder is the sum agreed upon therein. The error was therefore without injury to the appellants.

[3] The only other point urged in support of the appeal is that the notice of lien does not give the name of the person to whom the materials were furnished. The criticism is not supported by the language of the notice. It states that "F. T. Whitcomb is the name of the contractor," who on August 2, 1909, "entered into a contract in writing with" the plaintiffs, under which plaintiffs were to perform labor and furnish materials to be used in the construction of the building. It then sets out the subcontract with Whitcomb, states that the same has been fully performed by the plaintiffs, and that the building has been completed. This sufficiently shows that the name of the person to whom the materials were furnished and for whom the labor was done was F. T. Whitcomb. The statute does not require such literal exactness and rigid adherence to precise form as the appellants contend.

The order is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The defendants have filed petition for rehearing in which they present arguments and points not mentioned in the briefs upon which the case was submitted. This court has consistently declined to consider petitions for rehearing presenting new points. In Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 247, it held that it was too late to urge a point for the first time in a petition for rehearing after the case had been fully considered and decided by the court upon the points presented in the original briefs. In Kellogg v. Cochran, 87 Cal. 200, 25 Pac. 677, 12 L. R. A. 104, it said: "We have decided—and with manifest propriety—that we will not grant a rehearing in order to consider points not made in the argument upon which the case was originally submitted." In San Francisco v. Pacific Bank, 89 Cal. 25, 26 Pac. 615, 835, the court said: "The court will not consider a petition for rehearing that attempts to discuss the case upon grounds * * * not presented in the original argument or discussed in its opinion."

Upon these grounds it is clear that the petition must be denied. It is so ordered.

Rehearing Denied July 1, 1915.)

VENDOR AND PURCHASER. —187—INSTALLMENT CONTRACT—FORFEITURE—ESTOPPEL.

Where plaintiff's option contract for the purchase of land provided for successive payments on account of the purchase price, with the provision that the vendor might declare a forfeiture for default, where condemnation proceedings were instituted by the city, and the vendor so reasonably led plaintiff buyer to believe that it did not propose to insist on a forfeiture, but would wait for the payment of the balance of the price from the condemnation money, such vendor waived its right to insist on the forfeiture until notice to the buyer that it proposed to do so at a time sufficiently distant to give him reasonable opportunity to pay, and was estopped to declare forfeiture outright.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; George H. Hutton, Judge.

Action by the City of Los Angeles against Wm. G. Krutz, Jr., and the Nebraska & California Real Estate Company. Judgment for Krutz on his cross-complaint, and the Real Estate Company appeals. Affirmed.

Olin Wellborn, Jr., and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. John W. Shenk, City Atty., Howard Robertson, Chief Deputy City Atty., and Haas & Dunnigan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. The city of Los Angeles condemned a certain piece of land, part of a larger tract. Dispute having arisen between defendants Wm. G. Krutz, Jr., and the Nebraska & California Real Estate Company, a corporation, over the right to moneys arising under the condemnation proceedings, the city of Los Angeles interpleaded these defendants to have those rights determined. Defendant and respondent Krutz filed his answer and cross-complaint against the codefendant, Nebraska & California Real Estate Company, and by stipulation the action was tried upon this cross-complaint and the corporation's answer thereto; the city of Los Angeles being thus eliminated from the controversy. The respondent Krutz pleaded compliance upon his part with the terms of an executory contract for sale by the defendant corporation to him of the tract of land, a part of which, as has been said, was condemned by the city. He sought a decree of specific performance and an award to the defendant corporation of so much of the condemnation fund as was necessary to pay the corporation the balance of the purchase price of the land. The corporation defended, asserting that Krutz, by failure and neglect to make the payments provided, had lost all his rights under the contract. It sought a decree accordingly and a payment of the condemnation fund to it. The court's judgment was in favor of Krutz's contention, and the corporation appeals.

The contract between the parties provided as follows:

"In case said party of the second part (respondent) shall refuse, neglect or fail to pay such purchase money and interest as above stated and agreed, he shall forfeit any and all rights in and to said real estate acquired under and by virtue of this agreement, and shall forfeit any money paid for the purchase of the same, unless said party of the first part shall elect otherwise."

Defendant showed that, before the time when the remainder of the purchase price was due under the original contract, negotiations were had, culminating in a supplemental agreement whereby it extended the original agreement for the period of ninety days in consideration of the payment of $3,000, to be applied upon the purchase price; that the contract, as thus extended, fixed the last day of payment on June 17, 1909; that the payment was not made on that date, and on September 20, 1909, it exercised its option and declared a forfeiture. Appellant contends that under the equitable principle as expounded in Grey v. Tubbs, 43 Cal. 359, and the numerous other cases which have approved the doctrines there laid down, it was within its equitable rights in declaring the forfeiture, and that Krutz, for his inexcusable default, is remediless.

Respondent pleaded and showed that he first secured an option to purchase the land in question in February, 1907, paying therefor a valuable consideration; that the existence of the condemnation proceedings was known to and recognized by the parties, and Krutz covenanted to attend to the litigation and to hold the corporation harmless from any liability arising therefrom; that this option of purchase provided for successive payments on account of the purchase price, which respondent duly made, keeping his rights under the contract alive; that the condemnation proceedings resulted in a large judgment in favor of the owners of the land, and defendant corporation led and induced respondent to believe that it would wait until the fund arising under this condemnation judgment was available, and receive the final payment upon account of the contract out of that fund. Other facts, not necessary here to set forth in detail, are pleaded to show a waiver upon the part of the corporation of the provisions making time the essence of the contract, and further facts by which an estoppel in pais against the right of the corporation to claim a forfeiture is asserted. The court found in accordance with these allegations of the cross-complaint, found the ability of Krutz to pay the amount due within the time stipulated by the contract, but found that he failed to do so because led to believe by the declarations and representations of the corporation that it would wait till the condemnation fund was available for this payment.

The attack here is upon the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings. That evidence is principally documentary. It would serve no useful purpose to set it forth at length, but the whole tone, tenor, and effect are to create the belief which Krutz entertained that the corporation did not propose to insist upon the forfeiture, but would await the payment of the balance of the purchase price from the condemnation money, if that money was available within any reasonable time. There was therefore a waiver upon the part of the appellant corporation of the right of forfeiture which in equity would prevent it from asserting such forfeiture, at least until after notice to Krutz that it proposed to do so at a time sufficiently distant to give him a reasonable opportunity to make the payment. The corporation did not act in this way, but declared its forfeiture outright. It was estopped from so doing. Dolbeer v. Livingston, 100 Cal. 617, 35 Pac.

328; Carpy v. Dowdell, 115 Cal. 687, 47 Pac. 695; Nicholson v. Randall, 130 Cal. 539, 62 Pac. 930.

1. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡595—CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS.

Where accused's application for a continuance failed to show any diligence in searching for evidence as to his alleged insanity, alleged no substantial reason for failure to find it, and merely stated that he hoped to procure such evidence, not that he could do so, denial of postponement of trial on the ground was proper.

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡586, 1151 — CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

The denial or granting of postponement of trial is a matter resting in the discretion of the trial court, not reversible in the absence of abuse.

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1159—APPEAL AND ERROR—REVIEW—FINDINGS.

The findings of a jury on conflicting evidence that accused was not insane is conclusive upon the appellate court.

4. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡452—EVIDENCE—INSANITY.

In a prosecution for homicide, witnesses who talked with defendant often before and after the killing were properly allowed to testify that questions to him by them were answered quickly and promptly; such matter bearing on sanity, being subject to common observation, and not solely within expert knowledge.

5. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡311, 331—EVIDENCE—SANITY—PRESUMPTION.

6. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡570—SANITY—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Where the defendant in a criminal case offers evidence tending to show insanity, the prosecution in rebuttal may produce evidence of his sanity; since sanity is a defense which is sustained by proving it by a preponderance of evidence.

8. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡811—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS EMPHASIZING PARTICULAR MATTERS—SANITY.

In a prosecution for homicide, where the evidence as to the sanity of defendant's mother was vague and unsatisfactory, an instruction that if the jury believed the mother had been insane, and that insanity was hereditary, they should consider the matter in determining defendant's sanity, was properly refused as tending to magnify its importance in the minds of the jury; the general instructions on the subject being correct and full, and including the proposition that the jury might consider that defendant's ancestors were insane.

10. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡570 — INSANITY — MEASURE OF PROOF.

11. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1186—TRIAL—CONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY.

In a prosecution for murder, where the district attorney asked an obviously improper question on cross-examination of a witness, but the jury upon objection were directed to disregard it, there was no ground for reversal where the record as a whole showed that the defendant had a fair trial, and the evidence was clear and convincing; since, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted in any criminal case for the improper ruling on evidence, or for any error as to matter of pleading or procedure, unless after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Earl Martin Loomis was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. Fontaine Johnson and Dal M. Lemmon, both of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from a judgment of the superior court of Sacramento county imposing upon him a sentence of death, and also from an order denying him a new trial. He was charged with the murder of Marie G. Hollcroft, alleged to have been committed on August 17, 1914. He pleaded not guilty, but was convicted of murder of the first degree, without mitigation of punishment. Sentence was passed on November 17, 1914. The transcript on appeal was filed on January 4, 1915, but at defendant's request the hearing was postponed to the May, 1915, session at Sacramento.

[1] The defendant's application for a postponement of the trial was properly denied. The continuance was asked to enable him to obtain evidence relating to the alleged insanity of the defendant. No facts were stated to show the exercise of any diligence in searching for evidence, nor was any substantial reason given for the failure to find it. The defendant did not state that he could procure evidence on the subject, but merely showed that he hoped to do so. Under these circumstances the court had no choice but to go on with the trial.

[2] It is suggested that the showing made should have raised a doubt of the defendant's sanity at the time of the trial, and should have caused the court to suspend the proceedings and call a jury to determine the present sanity of the defendant as provided in section 1368 of the Penal Code. This claim is untenable. The statements in the affidavit offered in support of the motion for a continuance were not of such a character as to compel such doubt. They can scarcely be considered as tending to suggest a doubt on the subject. The matter was one calling for the exercise of the discretion of the trial court. No abuse of discretion is shown, and its decision must be upheld. People v. Hettick, 126 Cal. 426, 58 Pac. 918; People v. Geiger, 116 Cal. 440, 48 Pac. 389; People v. Kirby, 15 Cal. App. 269, 114 Pac. 794.

[3] The claim that the defendant should have been acquitted on the ground that the preponderance of the evidence established his insanity at the time of the homicide cannot be sustained. There was some evidence tending to show insanity. But there was also ample evidence to show that the defendant was sane. The case is in no wise different from the numberless cases in which we have held that the finding of a jury on conflicting evidence is conclusive upon this court.

[4] Witnesses who frequently talked with the defendant, after the homicide and before the murder, were allowed to testify that questions put to him by them were answered by him quickly and promptly. Objection was made that this was a matter for expert testimony, and that they did not show special knowledge as experts. There was no error in this. Such facts may be stated in testifying by any witness who has observed them. They are mere matters of observation, and not of expert knowledge. People v. Manoo-gian, 141 Cal. 595, 75 Pac. 177; People v. Lavelle, 71 Cal. 352, 12 Pac. 226; Holland v. Zollner, 102 Cal. 638, 36 Pac. 930, 37 Pac. 231; In re Wax, 106 Cal. 350, 39 Pac. 624.

[5, 6] The prosecution was not required to prove the defendant's sanity as a part of its case in chief. Sanity is presumed. If insanity is urged as a defense in a criminal case, it is for the defendant to prove it by a preponderance of the evidence. People v. Coffman, 24 Cal. 236; People v. Harris, 145 Pac. 526. If, in his defense, he offers evidence tending to show insanity, the prosecution, in rebuttal, may produce evidence of his sanity. The court did not err in allowing physicians to testify to his sanity in rebuttal of defendant's case.

[7] The court gave full and correct instructions to the jury on the subject of insanity and the burden of proof thereof. Other instructions on the subject were asked by the defendant and refused by the court. So far as these latter were correct in law, they differed from the instructions given only in the use of different words having the same meaning.

[8, 9] The defendant asked the following instruction:

"If the jury believe that the defendant's mother, in her lifetime, was insane, and that insanity is hereditary, they must take that fact into consideration in determining the question of defendant's insanity at the moment of shooting."

This is open to the criticism that it relates to a specific fact upon which the evidence was vague and unsatisfactory, and that, therefore, it might tend to magnify its importance in the minds of the jury. People v. Keith, 141 Cal. 690, 75 Pac. 304; People v. Patterson, 124 Cal. 102, 56 Pac. 882; Thomas v. Gates, 126 Cal. 4, 58 Pac. 315. The general instructions given on the subject were correct, and were sufficient to fully advise the jury thereon. They included the proposition that in determining sanity the jury might consider evidence that his ancestors were insane. Under these circumstances, even if the specified instruction was unobjectionable, it was not error to refuse it.

[10] The proposition that the defendant is entitled to acquittal if the evidence raises a reasonable doubt of his sanity is not the law in this state. The court properly refused to instruct the jury to that effect. People v. Coffman, supra; People v. Harris, supra.

[11] During the trial the district attorney, on cross-examining a sister of defendant, who had testified in his behalf, asked an obviously improper question. Objection was made at once, the objection was sustained, and the court directed the jury to disregard it. This is now assigned as misconduct on the part of the district attorney, although not so assigned at the trial. In the haste and zeal of a trial attorneys will sometimes ask improper questions. Judgments cannot be reversed for an inadvertence of this character, unless upon an examination of the record, including the evidence, we reach the opinion that it caused a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½. The record as a whole shows that the defendant had a fair trial, and the evidence of his guilt is clear and convincing. No miscarriage of justice appears. We cannot perceive that this irregularity could have affected the verdict. It must therefore be disregarded.

No other points are presented that deserve notice. We find no prejudicial error.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin F. Mull, Judge.

Action by W. M. Goodwin against the Whittier Coburn Company. From a judgment following the sustention of defendant's demurrer to an amended complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. M. Barnes, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bert F. Mull, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from the judgment which followed the sustaining of the demurrer to plaintiff's second amended complaint. Appellant's principal grievance would appear to be that the ruling of the court sustaining the demurrer was made in his absence, he being "at the time busy in another department." In response to this it is shown that upon no occasion when the pleading of plaintiff's attorney was under attack did he appear to defend it. He neither appeared upon the motion to quash service, upon the motion to set aside and strike his complaint from the files, upon the hearing of the demurrer to his amended complaint, nor upon the hearing of the demurrer to the second amended complaint, which was sustained without leave to amend. And, finally, it is shown that the demurrer, called for hearing at 10 o'clock a. m., was not reached until 2:30 of the afternoon of the same day. It is not, however, so much a matter of surprise that plaintiff's attorney should have absented himself from the hearing on the demurrer, as that he should have filed the complaint to which the demurrer was interposed.

The complaint charges that plaintiff is a married man; that he was engaged in the business of "building and contracting"; that there is an association in the city of Los Angeles "of credit men, building material dealers, of whom plaintiff has been buying his materials for building and contracting. The names of the members thereof are unknown to plaintiff," but are well known to defendant. This would seem to mean that plaintiff did not know the names of the "building material dealers" from whom he had been buying his material, but the defendant did. Next it is alleged that in November, 1912, the defendant "through its agents wrote a letter to said association stating that plaintiff owed defendant herein a bill of $33.80, and had owed the same since December, 1911, for materials purchased from said defendant by plaintiff." Defendant deposited this letter in the United States post office and the letter was received by the association through the post office on the day last mentioned. "That statement made in said letter above named was false, and well known to the defendant at the time of writing the same to be false and made by defendant willfully and maliciously. That said false and malicious statements in said letter became known to plaintiff's said wife on or about the 20th day of November, 1912. That the necessary and inevitable results of said knowledge to plaintiff's wife caused her to become ill with much increased continuous flowing of blood of the monthly period peculiar to women and caused her to have great distaste and repugnance toward plaintiff and to continue in said illness and frame of mind up to the present time, and, as plaintiff is informed and believes, she will so continue for a long time, the exact duration of which is unknown to plaintiff, solely as the necessary and inevitable result of said knowledge, and solely thereby and therefrom plaintiff is now and ever since said 20th day of November, 1912, has been deprived of the society and comfort of his said wife." "Plaintiff's said wife knew the contents of the said letter solely because of said mailing, and at the time of said mailing it was the intention of said defendant that plaintiff's wife should become possessed of said knowledge." By these acts plaintiff alleges he has been damaged in the sum of $5,000, and he asks exemplary damages in the sum of $5,000 more.

[1] Construing this pleading most strongly in favor of, rather than against, the pleader, we have here a charge that the defendant mailed a letter to some sort of an association of credit men of a building material dealers' association, falsely stating that plaintiff owed defendant $33 for materials furnished. We have the statement that the contents of this letter, received by the association on the 19th day of November, was in some unexplained manner made known to plaintiff's wife on the following day; that it was designed that she should know the contents, and it is then declared "that the necessary and inevitable results of said knowledge" were to estrange the wife from the husband, to inordinately increase her menstrual flow, and to work a continuance of this state of mind and of this physical condition "for a long time," "the exact duration of which is unknown to plaintiff."

It would be stultifying the law to enter into any exposition of the insufficiency of a complaint such as this to charge a cause of action.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by John J. Linehan against John Doe Devincense, also known as John Doe Derenchi. Judgment for plaintiff, and, from an order granting a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant. Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an appeal from the order of the court granting a new trial. The order is in the following language:

"In this action the motion for new trial herein having been heretofore submitted to the court for consideration and decision, and now the court having considered the same renders its judgment as follows: In consequence of the failure of defendant's attorney to present the motion, it has remained on the calendar. New trial granted November 25, 1912."

Seemingly from this order a new trial was granted for the laches of defendant's attorney in failing to present his motion. No neglect of any kind is imputed to plaintiff's attorney. It is difficult to understand why, for the reason given in the order itself, the motion should not have been denied rather than granted. It suggests an erroneous entry.

But passing this, and coming to the merits of the appeal, the action itself was brought by plaintiff to quiet title to a piece of land in the county of San Mateo, which piece of land may for convenience be described as the southwest quarter of lot 16. Both plaintiff and defendant claim title from a common source—Cecilia Brennan. Plaintiff's title was based upon a deed to him of the land by Cecilia Brennan, recorded in February, 1904. Defendant claims through an executory contract of sale, under which he had been admitted to possession of the land by Cecilia Brennan in 1903. This executory contract is in the following language:

"San Francisco, May 6, 1903.

"Received of Mr. Derenchi $50, being deposit on account of property in San Mateo the piece to be paid $700, the purchase price of the property this day sold to subject to the owner's approval, and being in the city of Colma, county of San Mateo, state of California, and described as follows: Lot 16, as known and designated on certain map marked map of the property at the Villa Homestead Association which said map is on file in the office of county recorder of the county of San Mateo, state of California, and recorded in said county.

"Term of sale 15 days are allowed to examine title and consummate the sale. At the termination of said time the balance of said purchase money is due and payable upon tender of the deed of the property sold if the title is defective, 60 days are allowed to perfect the same, and if, after the expiration of said term, unless extended by mutual consent, the title shall not have been perfected, the deposit is to be returned.

"[Signed] Cecilia Bremen, Owner,
By L. C. Cull, Agents."

It was first recorded precisely as above set forth on February 27, 1905, and then again upon December 22, 1905, was once more recorded with the following added: "Witness to signature of Cecilia Bremen, Lawrence C. Cull."

Defendant by answer set up his possession under this contract, and by cross-complaint averred the performance by him of all things necessary to be done under the contract, made a tender of the amount due thereunder, and demanded specific performance. To overcome the controlling effect of the deed recorded in 1904 over the executory contract first recorded in 1905, defendant alleged that plaintiff at the time that he took his conveyance knew of the existing contract. This plaintiff denied. The court's findings were wholly in favor of the plaintiff, and judgment passed for him. The new trial was ordered under the circumstances above indicated.

Appellant argues with much force that this new trial could have been granted only upon the theory of a valid written contract between Cecilia Brennan and the defendant; that if such a contract did not exist defendant had no defense to this action, and, as the existence of this contract depends upon the copy of it produced from the records (the original having been destroyed by fire), this court can and will consider the evidence touching this contract precisely as it would be considered by a trial court. Wilson v. Cross, 33 Cal. 60; Reynolds v. Snow, 67 Cal. 497, 8 Pac. 27; Tuller v. Arnold, 93 Cal. 166, 28 Pac. 863. So construing this contract, appellant argues that upon its face it bears overwhelming and conclusive evidence that it was never executed by Cecilia Brennan, and that there is not a word of evidence that Cull, who signed his name as agent under that of Cecilia Bremen, was ever her duly authorized agent or attorney in fact to execute in her name and on her behalf the instrument in question.

[1, 2] The evidence in this regard is certainly most potent and persuasive. The contract itself declares that the property is sold "subject to the owner's approval"—a clause which, in the nature of things, would not be in a contract executed by the owner herself. The name of the owner was Cecilia Brennan. The contract is signed "Cecilia Bremen." Cecilia Brennan, it is disclosed, could write. It is not to be presumed that she would misspell her own name. Moreover, the contract as originally recorded declares, if language means anything, that the name of "Cecilia Bremen, Owner," was written by "L. C. Cull, Agent." And finally the language, "Witness to signature of Cecilia Bremen, Lawrence C. Cull," was unquestionably added to the instrument after its first recordation and after the death of Cecilia Brennan, who died within a year after the date of the execution of the original contract. The effort therefore to establish the execution of this contract by the belated declaration of Lawrence C. Cull that he signed as a witness to the signature of Cecilia Bremen is unavailing under all of the authorities. He did not sign as a subscribing witness and the second recordation of the instrument was without efficacy as tending to establish the execution of it by Cecilia Brennan herself. Hollenback v. Fleming, 6 Hill (N. Y.) 305; Early v. St. Patrick's Church, 81 Hun, 369, 30 N. Y. Supp. 981; Pritchard v. Palmer, 88 Hun, 412, 34 N. Y. Supp. 789; In re Clute's Estate, 37 Misc. Rep. 586, 75 N. Y. Supp. 1060. Nor is this evidence at all overcome by the statement of Mrs. Ottoboni, sister-in-law of the defendant, that she knew Cecilia Brennan in her lifetime, had seen her signature, had seen the original of the contract, and that the signature to the original of the contract was like the other signatures of Cecilia Brennan.

[3] Were there nothing further upon this appeal, the order granting a new trial would of necessity be reversed for the utter failure to show an existing contract between Cecilia Brennan and this defendant. But there are other considerations which remove any possible doubt upon the question if any could be said to exist. Thus the contract which Cecilia Brennan is said to have entered into was one for the conveyance of the whole tract of land. It is established and, indeed, admitted that she did not own it all, that part of it was owned by her sister, whose estate was in probate. As she could not have compelled specific performance of the contract, so specific performance may not be enforced against her or her successor in interest. Civ. Code, § 3386; Husheon v. Kelley, 162 Cal. 656, 661, 124 Pac. 231. We are not unmindful of the early case of Marshall v. Caldwell, 41 Cal. 613, and Swain v. Burnette, 76 Cal. 301, 18 Pac. 394, which latter relies upon the first cited case for its authority. But the force of these cases as authority is entirely destroyed by the more recent decisions of Jackson v. Torrence, 83 Cal. 521, 23 Pac. 695, and Olson v. Lovell, 91 Cal. 508, 27 Pac. 765. In the earlier of these cases last mentioned the husband and wife jointly agreed to sell a piece of property which they owned in undivided interests. The wife refused to acknowledge the contract, and thus it became nonenforceable against her. Plaintiff sought to compel a conveyance by the husband of his undivided interest, and it was held that equity would not decree such a conveyance. In the later case of Olson v. Lovell, the vendee contracted to purchase a tract of land owned by the vendors as cotenants.

The contract was signed by one of the vendors. The name of the other was signed without authority. The court refused a specific performance to the vendee of the interest of the vendor who had formally executed the contract, and in its decision pointed out that the foundation of the determination in Jackson v. Torrence was not that equity refused specific performance because the parties defendant were husband and wife, but because to compel a part performance by the husband would be to make him "perform a contract which he never made or intended to make," and the same equitable principle was applied in Olson v. Lovell.

[4] And finally it may be said that the uncontradicted evidence shows that defendant, after notification from plaintiff that the latter would not deed the property to the former in pursuance of the terms of the asserted contract with Cecilia Brennan, took no steps to enforce his right under that contract, and meets this action to quiet title by a cross-complaint seeking specific performance years after plaintiff's repudiation of the contract was made known to him. Under the authority of O'Donnell v. Jackson, 69 Cal. 622, 11 Pac. 251, this unexplained laches precluded any rights which defendant might otherwise have had to a specific performance of the contract.

The order granting a new trial is therefore reversed.

SAN FRANCISCO STEVEDORING CO. et al.
v. PILLSBURY et al., Industrial Accident Commission. (S. F. 7435.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 2, 1915.)

MASTER AND SERVANT — 250%, New, vol. 16
Key-No. Series—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ESTOPPEL BY ACTION TO CLAIM COMPENSATION UNDER INDUSTRIAL COMPENSATION ACT.

Where an employé injured in the course of his duties brought an action in the superior court, such commencement of action was not a final election of the employé's remedy depriving the Industrial Accident Commission of jurisdiction to award him compensation, since the judgment of the superior court sustaining a demurrer to the complaint merely determined that the allegations failed to state a case of the character for which the Industrial Compensation Act provides an exception to its general provision that the right to recover compensation under it shall be an injured employé's exclusive remedy, and that therefore the proper tribunal for the adjudication of the claim was the Industrial Accident Commission.

In Bank. Proceedings under the Industrial Compensation Act by Jeremiah Broderick to obtain compensation for personal injuries opposed by the San Francisco Stevedoring Company, the employer. Compensation was awarded, and the employer petitions for certiorari to review the proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission resulting in the award. Application denied.

Lloyd S. Ackerman, of San Francisco, for petitioners. C. M. Bradley, of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. Petitioners seek a writ of certiorari to review the proceedings of the Industrial Accident Commission resulting in an award by said commission to one Jeremiah Broderick of compensation for personal injuries alleged to have been received by him in the course of his employment by the San Francisco Stevedoring Company.

The only point made in support of the application is that the Industrial Commission was without jurisdiction by reason of the fact that Broderick, prior to instituting his proceeding before the Industrial Commission, instituted an action for damages on account of the same injuries against the stevedoring company, in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco. A demurrer to his complaint interposed by the company was sustained by said court, and, on his failure to amend, judgment was given against him. At the time of the award by the Industrial Commission, Broderick had filed a waiver of his right of appeal. It is claimed that by commencing his action in the superior court Broderick finally elected his remedy, and thus deprived the commission of jurisdiction in the matter, and also that the superior court judgment is a final determination of his rights in the matter.

We are satisfied that there is no force in this claim. The Industrial Compensation Act provides substantially that, where the specified conditions of compensation exist, the right to recover such compensation in a proceeding before the commission shall be the exclusive remedy of the employé, "except that when the injury was caused by the employer's gross negligence or willful misconduct and such act or failure to act causing such injury was the personal act or failure to act on the part of the employer himself, * * * and such act or failure to act indicated a willful disregard of the life, limb or bodily safety of the employés, any such injured employé may, at his option, either claim compensation under this act or maintain an action at law for damages."

It will thus be seen that the right of the employé to resort at his option to an action at law for damages is restricted to the class of cases specified in the provision just quoted, viz., cases where the injury was caused by the employer's gross negligence or willful misconduct of a certain specified character. The judgment of the superior court in Broderick's action simply determines that the allegations of his complaint failed to state a case of this character, and therefore that the proper tribunal for the adjudication of his claim is the Industrial Accident Commission. Nothing else can be held to have been determined against him. He cannot be held to be estopped thereby from pursuing his remedy before the commission, nor can the commission be held to have been without jurisdiction of the proceeding instituted by him.

The application for a writ of certiorari is denied.

It is a part of the power as well as the duty of the state to guide and guard the helpless young, in the exercise of which duty it may provide for the custody and maintenance of abandoned children, and process of law and a forum to determine whether a child is an abandoned child, and may base proceedings in guardianship and in adoption upon decrees of abandonment, and declare what acts shall constitute abandonment by parents.

While a decree that a child is an abandoned child, made after proceedings duly had, is a final adjudication of its status as of the date of the decree, resulting under Civ. Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Petition by the parents of Rosa Michels, an infant, for appointment as guardians of her person, opposed by Verna Shaw. Decree for opponent, and the parents appeal. Reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer and to allow any person in interest to appear and plead to the merits of the petition.

Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Schweitzer & Hutton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Petitioners, who are likewise the appellants herein, are the father and mother of Rosa Michels, a female child, aged about seven years. They petitioned the superior court to be appointed guardians of the person of their infant daughter. Their petition showed that they are husband and wife, and that the child was born in lawful wedlock; that some years previously they came to Los Angeles with their five children, the eldest then about ten years of age, the youngest Rosa, then about one year of age. At that time Rosa was crippled and unable to stand on her feet. A physician told the parents that the child should be sent to a hospital for treatment, and the child was sent to the Children's Hospital, a charitable institution, where she was taken care of without charge. She remained there 12 months—11 of those months upon a stretcher. During that period the father called upon her frequently. The mother was unable to do so, being herself engrossed in her household duties, being ill, and during that period giving birth to another child. Miss Verna Shaw was a nurse in the Children's Hospital and became interested in little Rosa. Verna Shaw sought to be allowed to adopt her. The father declined to accede to her request, but permitted her to take the child to her parents' ranch in the neighborhood of Los Angeles, where it was represented the child would improve in health, with pure air and fresh milk. It was agreed between the parents and Verna Shaw that she should take the child, keep her at the ranch for a period of two years, and then return her to her parents. The child was taken to the ranch. Thereafter Verna Shaw visited the petitioners, and told them the child was doing well. They asked to see it, but Verna Shaw replied that it was better that the child be not brought to the city. Receiving no more visits from Verna Shaw, the petitioners called upon her at the Children's Hospital and were told that Verna Shaw had left the hospital and that her address was unknown. The child was taken to the country in the early part of the year 1911, and they did not learn where she was until March, 1914, when they took steps to regain her custody. Upon learning that petitioners desired to secure possession of the child, Verna Shaw proceeded to have the child declared by the juvenile court to be an abandoned child, and for that purpose, on or about the 1st of May, 1914, filed in the superior court a petition under the act concerning dependent and delinquent minor children (Stats. 1909, p. 213; Civ. Code, § 224), in which petition it was declared that the infant, Rosa Michels, was on the 24th day of December, 1910, left in the care and custody of Verna Shaw by the parents of the minor without the parents making any provision for the minor's support. A hearing was had in the juvenile department of the superior court before the Honorable Fred H. Taft, and the superior court determined and declared Rosa Michels to be an abandoned child. Petitioners were present at the hearing in person and by their attorney, and introduced evidence showing that they had not abandoned the child and never intended to abandon the child, and, after the court made its order declaring the child to be an abandoned child, petitioners instructed their attorney to appeal from this order and decree. Through the oversight, inadvertence, or neglect of their attorney, their appeal was not taken. The petition then asserts that section 224 of the Civil Code, by virtue of which the proceedings resulting in the declaration that the child was an abandoned child were had, is null and void as being in violation of sections 1, 6, and 13 of article 1 of the Constitution of the state of California, and of the fifth, fourteenth, and eighth amendments of the Constitution of the United States.

The petitioners further declare that they are the owners of a fruit and grocery store, the income from which suffices to provide a comfortable living for themselves and all their children; that, while the order of the superior court declared the child to be an abandoned child, neither that nor any other order of the court provided a guardian for the child, nor gave it other parents by adoption. It is then averred, touching the spiritual welfare of the child, that section 27 of the juvenile act provides that children coming within the purview of the act shall be placed "with people of the same or similar religious belief"; that petitioners are members of the Roman Catholic Church; that Verna Shaw is a young unmarried woman without a home of her own, is not of the Roman Catholic faith, is obliged to and does maintain herself by her own exertions as a nurse in the office of a physician, and is compelled to leave the care of the child to relatives and other persons not of the Roman Catholic faith.

A demurrer was interposed to this petition, and the hearing was before the same judge who presided at the hearing of the petition to have the infant declared an abandoned child. The court sustained the demurrer and declared that the "petition does not state facts sufficient to require the appointment of petitioners as guardians of the person of the said infant."

The order and the only order of the court entered in the matter of the proceedings had under section 224 of the Civil Code is puzzling in its language. It is in the following words:

"It is stipulated in open court that the petition (of Verna Shaw) be denied and that further evidence might be taken at this time, notice being waived, all parties agreeing thereto. The court ordered that the child be declared abandoned."

It is not clear from this why, if the petition was denied, the child should have been declared an abandoned child. But, for the purposes of this consideration, this order adjudging the child to be an abandoned child may be taken as satisfactory and complete. So taking it, we may come directly to the consideration of certain questions here involved. Certain, we say, because the demands of this case do not require that all of appellants' arguments, and in particular those against the constitutionality of section 224 of the Civil Code, should be considered.

[1] Upon the general proposition, suffice it to say this: That it is unquestionably a part of the power as well as a part of the duty of the state to guide and guard its helpless young. In the exercise of that duty, it is quite proper for the state to make provision for the custody, care, and maintenance of abandoned children, and in so doing to provide process of law and a forum for the determination of the question whether or not a child is an abandoned child. Upon a determination of abandonment, it is equally within the power and the duty of the state to provide for the care and nurture of the child in the future, and proceedings in guardianship and proceedings in adoption may be and by our law are based upon decrees of abandonment. And finally it is within the power of the state to declare what sins and acts of omission or commission shall constitute abandonment by the parent or parents. Unquestionably due process of law demands some sufficient notice to the parents of the proceedings about to be taken, with an opportunity to the parents to be heard upon the issue. But, so far as concerns this case, it appears by the petition that the parents not only received this notice, but responded to it, and were present in court with their attorney, at the hearing.

[2] Unquestionably also a decree that a child is an abandoned child, duly given after proceedings duly had, is a final adjudication of the status of this child as of the date of the decree. But the underlying question in this case is how far-reaching and how conclusive upon the future rights of the parents is such a decree of abandonment, treating it, as here we do, as a final, valid, subsisting decree.

Respondent argues broadly that the effect of the decree is forever to destroy parental rights in both their characteristics, to destroy the property right which the parent has in the child, and to destroy the natural right to the care, custody, nurture, and love of the offspring; that, the child having been decreed to be an abandoned child by an order which has become final, the present petition of the parents for letters of guardianship is to be treated as the unwarranted intrusion of strangers.

This view of the scope and meaning of a simple decree that a child has been abandoned by its parents is altogether beyond the reason of the law and so beyond the law. It is no more in contemplation of the law that parents should forever be deprived of the custody of a child because of a judgment of abandonment, than it is within the contemplation or power of the law to say that the decree of abandonment extirpates and destroys all parental affection for the child. What a decree of abandonment amounts to is defined by section 246, subd. 4, of the Civil Code. It is a decree which judicially strips the parents of the then present right to the guardianship, care, custody, and control of the child. If other provision, thereafter, shall have been made for such custody and control, it may be that, upon hearing, the court will not disturb such custody, but this does not mean that the parents shall not be heard. We are not in this consideration confronted with the case of a child which, after a decree of abandonment, has been either adopted or provided with a guardian, and as well said in Matter of Forrester, 162 Cal. 493, 123 Pac. 283:

"The past failure of a parent to provide for his child may well coexist with a present ability to fully discharge all the duties of guardianship."

While the law has earnestly at heart the welfare of a child, yet, as pointed out in the same case, it will not even under such considerations, deprive the natural guardians of their rights. It is no light thing to endeavor to destroy the love of offspring which nature has implanted in every normal human being, nor does the law contemplate the doing of such a thing. It proposes merely to lend its guiding hand to helpless youth who have been deserted or abandoned from any cause. But it never means to say that if the cause has been removed, in other words, if the parents can show their present competency, willingness, and ability to support and maintain their offspring, they shall not be heard merely because some earlier decree that they have abandoned their child is supposed to have erected insurmountable barriers, and absolutely to have destroyed all their rights. Upon an application by the parents under such circumstances, if intervening rights following the decree of abandonment have come in, as if a guardian of the person has been appointed, or if the child has been formally adopted, these matters may be shown and will be considered upon the hearing. But in every such case, under the dictates of the law, which would be barbarous otherwise, but which is in truth humane, the parents are entitled to their day in court and to such a showing for the recovery of their offspring as they are able to make.

It was error, therefore, for the court to sustain a general demurrer to this petition; and the judgment is therefore reversed, with directions to the trial court to overrule the demurrer and to allow any person in interest to appear and plead to the merits of appellants' petition.

HARTIGAN v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES
et al. (L. A. 4062.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 918 — BONDS — ELECTION — PROPOSITIONS — SEPARATE SUBMISSION.

Where the issuance of bonds by a city is submitted to vote of electors to comply with Const. art. 11, § 18, providing that no city shall incur any indebtedness exceeding the revenue for the year in which it is incurred without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors, there must be a separate proposition on the ballot for each distinct, unrelated, and independent object or purpose for which it is proposed to incur indebtedness, showing expressly the amount desired for each one, in order that the voter may express his choice on each without thereby affecting the other.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 918 — BOND ISSUE ELECTION — VALIDITY — PLEADING — COMPLAINT — SUFFICIENCY.

In an action to enjoin defendant city and its officers from issuing certain bonds on the ground that the election required by the Constitution to authorize such bond issue had been invalid because the ballot had not submitted the question of authorizing municipal improvements, alleged to be separate and distinct, separately to the voters, in considering the question whether or not the proposed bond issue was for two distinct purposes, the court could not consider facts not alleged in the complaint, and not within its cognizance by judicial notice.

3. EVIDENCE — 1 — JUDICIAL NOTICE — LOCAL PUBLIC CONTROVERSIES.

Local and temporary conditions of public sentiment and local public controversies, as whether a city should merely complete a generating plant for electric power, or acquire distributing facilities for such power as well, are not subjects of judicial notice.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. 1.]

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 918 — BONDS — MUNICIPAL GENERATING AND DISTRIBUTING PLANT — SUBMISSION TO VOTE.

The city of Los Angeles was authorized by vote of its electors to issue bonds to the amount of $6,500,000 to provide a municipal plant for the supply of electricity, $1,250,000 to be spent in completing a power station, etc., that had already been partly finished, and $5,250,000 to be spent in constructing or acquiring distributing lines, conduits and substations, and the acquisition of lands, right of way, machinery, etc., necessary therefor. The plaintiff, a resident citizen and taxpayer of the city, sued to enjoin the issuance of such bonds, contending that no valid election had been held for the approval of the issue, since the ballot submitted the question of the expenditure in a single proposition, while he claimed that the completion of the power station and the acquisition of the distributing facilities were two independent improvements, which should have been submitted separately. Held, that the description of the objects of the expenditure in the ballot as "works for supplying said city and its inhabitants with electricity for purposes of light, heat and power," proceeding to state that such works included both a generating plant and a distributing system, stating the elements of the plant and of the system, and the estimated cost of such two parts of the improvement, presented but one municipal improvement for popular approval, properly submitted as such on the ballot.

5. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS — 918 — BONDS — MUNICIPAL GENERATING PLANT — SUBMISSION TO VOTE — STATUTES — "CONSTRUCTING" — "ACQUISITION."

Where the proposition on the ballot, in an election to authorize the city of Los Angeles to issue bonds for a municipal improvement, stated that $1,250,000 was to be used for the "construction or acquisition of electric generating works," such city was thereby authorized to use the sum for the completion of a partly constructed generating plant, since the language of the bond act, authorizing the city council, when it shall determine that the public interest or necessity demands "the acquisition, construction, or completion" of any municipal improvement exceeding the city's annual income, to call a special election and submit the matter to the voters, does not necessarily imply that the acquisition of an improvement, or its construction, or completion, is each a separate and distinct proposition which must be submitted separately to the voters for their approval, and that money voted to construct improvements cannot be expended to complete an improvement already partially constructed, for the city would be "constructing" an improvement if it was engaged in the building of the unfinished portion of works already begun, and it could accomplish the "acquisition" of an improvement by buying an entire plant, by constructing a new one, or by completing one partially constructed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by Frank E. Hartigan against the City of Los Angeles and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. R. Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Howard Robertson, W. B. Mathews, and Wm. B. Himrod, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff, as a resident, citizen and taxpayer of the city of Los Angeles, began the action to enjoin the city and its officers from issuing, signing, or selling certain bonds of the city amounting to $6,500,000. The plaintiff claims that no valid election has been held for the approval of said bond issue by the voters of the city.

[1] The constitutional provision is that no city shall incur any indebtedness exceeding the revenue for the year in which it is incurred "without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified electors thereof voting at an election to be held for that purpose." Article 11, § 18. The act of 1901, as amended in 1913, providing for such elections, declares that propositions for incurring indebtedness for more than one object or purpose may be submitted at the same election, and that the ordinance calling the election must recite the objects and purposes for which the indebtedness is proposed to be incurred. Stats. 1913, p. 13. The rule of the decisions regarding more than one object or purpose is:

"That there must be a separate proposition on the ballot for each distinct, unrelated, and independent object or purpose for which it is proposed to incur indebtedness, and showing separately the amount desired for each one, in order that the voter may express his choice on each without thereby affecting the other." Clark v. Los Angeles, 160 Cal. 321, 116 Pac. 966.

The election, the validity of which is here attacked, was held on May 8, 1914, in pursuance of ordinances passed for that purpose under the aforesaid bond act. The ordinance calling the election provided that the proposition should be stated on the ballot in the following form:

"Shall the city of Los Angeles incur a bonded debt of $6,500,000 for the purpose of acquiring and constructing a certain revenue-producing municipal improvement, to wit: Works for supplying said city and its inhabitants with electricity for purposes of light, heat and power, including the construction or acquisition of electric generating works, receiving substations, transmission lines, and the acquisition of lands, water rights, rights of way, machinery, apparatus and other works and property necessary therefor, the estimated cost of which is $1,250,000; also including the construction or acquisition of distributing lines, conduits and substations, and the acquisition of lands, rights of way, machinery, apparatus and other works and property necessary therefor, the estimated cost of which is $5,250,000."

This proposition was stated on the ballot, in the language above given, as a single proposition. To the right were the words "Yes" and "No," printed on separate lines, with voting squares at the side wherein the voter might indicate his choice for or against the proposal as an entirety. There was no mode provided by which the voter could vote "No" on that part of the proposition relating to the acquisition or construction of generating works with the substations, transmission lines, lands, machinery, and other property necessary therefor, estimated to cost $1,250,000, and vote "Yes" on that part of the proposition embracing the acquisition or construction of distributing lines, conduits, and other property necessary therefor, estimated to cost $5,250,000. The contention of the plaintiff is that these two branches or elements of the proposition constituted two distinct municipal improvements which should have been submitted separately in such a manner that the voter could vote for or against either or both, at his option. The ordinance declaring the necessity for the issuance of the bonds in question described the municipal improvement in the same words as on the ballot.

In support of his claim that this presents two distinct improvements, the plaintiff alleges the following facts which do not appear in the ordinance or on the ballot used at the election: Prior to the adoption of the resolution, the city of Los Angeles had constructed a municipal improvement known as the Los Angeles aqueduct. This aqueduct is not otherwise described, but we take it to be a conduit for the conveyance of water to Los Angeles for the use of the city and its inhabitants. Along and upon this aqueduct the city had begun the construction of a plant for the generation of electricity and had already expended thereon $3,500,000, leaving it unfinished. It would require the expenditure of $1,250,000 to complete it. At the time and prior to the proceedings for the election the city proposed, and now proposes, to expend $1,250,000 of the bond money in completing this generating plant, and not for the construction or acquisition of new or other electric generating works. Neither the ordinance nor the ballot shows that this $1,250,000 is to be used for the completion of the existing unfinished generating works. No reference was made to any unfinished works in any of the proceedings. There was at that time, and there is now, as the complaint alleges, no necessity for the construction or acquisition of a distributing system, being that part of the proposition calling for an expenditure of $5,250,000. The reasons for this lack of necessity are stated to be that the city was then, and now is, adequately supplied with systems for distributing electric current, that there was and is no necessity for the city to engage in such distribution, and that if the city should generate electricity, after completing its plant, it could dispose of all such electric current without engaging in the municipal distribution thereof. The plaintiff was a voter of the city, and entitled to vote at said election, and desired to vote in favor of incurring the indebtedness of $1,250,000 for the completion of the unfinished generating plant and to vote against the incurring of any indebtedness for the construction or acquisition of a distributing system. On the proposition as submitted on the ballot, in order to express his choice in favor of the $1,250,000 indebtedness, he was obliged to vote in favor of bonds amounting to $6,500,000.

[2, 3] In considering the question whether or not the proposed bonded debt was for two distinct purposes concerning which the voters should have been given the opportunity to approve or reject either or both, the court cannot consider, as bearing upon the question, facts not alleged and not within judicial cognizance. Local and temporary conditions of public sentiment and local public controversies are not of the latter class, and they must be alleged in order to become the basis for an argument. In his brief the plaintiff states that it is a well-known fact that the advisability of municipal ownership of an electric distribution system by Los Angeles was, at and before the time of said election, a question which was much discussed and upon which public sentiment was divided; that there were thousands of voters in the city who favored the completion of the generating plant, but greatly opposed the city engaging in municipal distribution; that several large companies were engaged in distributing electricity adequately and cheaply to the city and its inhabitants; that the wisdom of the city's taking over this branch of the work was open to serious question, and that the voters of the city were greatly divided in their beliefs on the subject, but that the completion of the partially constructed plant was generally favored, and the necessity of it was plainly apparent. The plaintiff alleges that he was a voter of the city, and desired to vote in favor of one part of the proposition and against the other part, and found himself unable to do so, but it is not averred that there were any other voters so minded. The argument seems to be that those who favored a municipal distributing system procured the city council to combine that project with the proposition to complete the unfinished generating plant along the aqueduct, in order to make the popularity and necessity of the latter carry the proposition for $5,250,000 to buy or build a municipal distributing system. If these facts had been alleged, or were susceptible of judicial notice, there might be some force in this argument. But they are not alleged, and we must determine the question solely upon the facts set forth in the complaint.

[4] We are to determine whether or not the facts alleged, namely, that the $1,250,000 was necessary to complete the generating plant and save the money already expended thereon; that that amount of the bond money was to be used for that purpose; that the city and its inhabitants were already amply supplied with electricity distributed by public service corporations; and that the electricity generated by the proposed plant could be readily disposed of by the city without the erection by it of any distributing plant—necessarily lead to the conclusion that the proposition is a dual one the parts of which must be submitted separately. We think the question is settled by the decision in Clark v. Los Angeles, supra. One proposition for bonds, considered in that case, was the expenditure of $3,000,000 for the construction of harbor improvements in San Pedro Bay, of which $2,000,000 was to be expended for improvements on the south side of a certain established line and $1,000,000 for similar improvements on the northerly side of said line. It was urged that this constituted a double object, that the different sums to be expended for the different improvements on the respective sides of the line constituted separate and distinct objects upon which the voters were entitled to express their choice separately. The court held that the purpose intended was a single purpose, namely, that of improving the harbor of San Pedro by the construction of docks, wharves, and warehouses with the streets and waterways necessary or convenient for their use and for access to, and from the land on one side and the water on the other. The court said:

"All this constituted but one general plan or object. The fact that the estimated cost was stated in two sums, $2,000,000 for the improvements on one side of the line described, and $1,000,000 for those on the other side, does not render the two parts so distinct that they cannot be embraced in one scheme for improving the harbor, nor does it make each an entirely separate and distinct enterprise."

The municipal improvement for which the $6,500,000 was to be expended in the present case is described in the ordinance and on the ballot as "works for supplying said city and its inhabitants with electricity for purposes of light, heat and power," and the description then proceeds to say that this includes both a generating plant and a distributing system, stating the particular elements of the generating plant and of the distributing system and the estimated cost of each of these two parts of the improvement. We think it must be conceded that, under the rule as stated in the Clark Case, this does not describe two distinct and separate objects or improvements, but merely provides for one system for supplying electricity to the city and its inhabitants, including both the production of the supply and the distribution thereof. Neither the fact that the $3,500,000 already expended upon the generating plant would be lost if it is not completed, nor the fact that the plant, when completed, could be leased at a profit, nor the fact that the city could operate the generating plant alone and sell the product readily to distributing companies already in operation and serving the city, nor all of these combined, are sufficient to divide the proposed system, as matter of law, into two improvements, or to render it necessary for the council to submit the two parts separately on the ballot. While it might have submitted separate proposals, it was not bound to do so. It was a matter within its discretion.

[5] The plaintiff makes the further objection that, although the proposition on the ballot stated that the $1,250,000 was to be used for the "construction or acquisition of electric generating works," the city, in fact, proposes to use said sum for the completion of the already partially constructed generating plant, and not for the acquisition or construction of such works, and that this would be an illegal diversion of the funds raised from the proposed bonds. Upon this he insists he is entitled to the relief prayed for by way of injunction to prevent the unlawful use of the bond money. The objection is based upon the language of the bond act, authorizing the city council, when it shall "determine that the public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction or completion of any municipal improvement" exceeding the annual income, to call a special election and submit the matter to the voters. The argument is that this necessarily implies that the acquisition of the improvement, the construction of the improvement, and the completion of the improvement each constitutes a separate and distinct proposition which must be submitted separately, and that money voted to acquire or construct improvements cannot be expended for purposes of completing an improvement already partially constructed. Neither the ordinance nor the ballot, as above stated, mentioned the fact that the money was to be used to complete an unfinished plant. We do not think the words of the bond act should be so strictly construed. The purpose, as stated on the ballot, included the acquisition or construction of electric generating works. The word "completion" in the act would seem to have been unnecessary if the words "acquisition or construction" are to be given an effect as broad as their ordinary meaning. It was probably inserted to prevent doubts from arising where an issue of bonds was proposed to finish an uncompleted improvement. It serves no other purpose, and does not add anything to the effect that would be given to the other words if it had been omitted. The city would be "constructing" an improvement if it was engaged in the building of the unfinished portion of works already begun. It could accomplish the "acquisition" of an improvement by buying an entire plant, by constructing an entirely new one, or by completing one which it had partially constructed. These words include the completion of unfinished works belonging to the city; that being one method of constructing and acquiring such works. The money voted for "acquisition or construction" could therefore lawfully be used in completing the unfinished works. It is not claimed that any one was misled by the description of the generating works as given on the ballot.

The cases cited by the plaintiff, to the effect that when money is appropriated for completing a specified building the administrative officers cannot use it for the erection of another building, are not applicable to this question. Such officers are, of course, bound by a specific legislative direction of that character, and cannot divert the fund to a different use. Nothing of that kind is proposed here. We find no ground upon which the judgment of the court below can be disturbed.

TAKEKAWA v. HOLE. (L. A. 3460.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1915.)

1. TRIAL — 387 — TRIAL BY COURT — "DECISION" — SUPPORT IN FINDINGS.

The decision of the court, which in fact is the oral judgment in the case, is to derive its support from written findings of fact and conclusions of law signed by the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 903-907; Dec. Dig. — 387.]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Decision.]

2. JUDGMENT — 271 — ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

The ministerial duty of the clerk is to enter a judgment in conformity with the decision of the court evidenced by the signed findings and conclusions; and it is proper for the court to give the form of judgment which the decision or oral judgment requires for the direction of the clerk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 504-509; Dec. Dig. — 271.]

3. TRIAL — 397 — FINDINGS AND CONCLUSIONS OF LAW.

In an action to recover real property, and shares of stock in a water company, the judgment controlled, and if the findings supported it, the mere absence of a specific conclusion of law upon plaintiff's right to a delivery of the stock from a judgment that defendant should comply with the terms of his contract and transfer the stock to plaintiff, as well as the reality, would not defeat the judgment, since the conclusion was expressed in the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 940-945; Dec. Dig. — 397.]

4. JUDGMENT — 303 — AMENDMENT — CONFORMITY TO DECISION.

The court at nisi prius may always amend its own judgments to make them conform to the decision which it actually rendered, but cannot subsequently amend by new modifications or enlargements of the judgment, or the judgment record, so as to make the judgment express anything not embraced in the decision, even though the proposed amendment contains matters which ought to have been embraced.

5. JUDGMENT — 305 — ENTRY — MISPRISION.

The court in deciding that plaintiff was entitled to recover real property, which decision was entered as its judgment, on its declaration that the judgment was to be amended not by the insertion of new matter but by correcting the record to have it contain all the matters actually decided but not entered through misprision of the clerk was authorized to amend the record of the judgment so as to declare plaintiff entitled to a recovery of stock, in accordance with the actual decision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 596, 597; Dec. Dig. — 305.]

6. JUDGMENT — 328 — AMENDMENT — VACATION.

Where the court was mistaken in its declaration, in ordering an amendment, that the judgment was amended not by the insertion of new matter but by correcting the record to have it speak the entire decision of the court, such mistake might be shown upon the motion to vacate the order.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 630, 637; Dec. Dig. — 328.]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by M. Takekawa against W. J. Hole. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 17 Cal. App. 653, 121 Pac. 296.

Anderson & Anderson and Watkins & Blodget, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Kemp, Mitchell & Silberberg, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This cause was tried in the superior court of Orange county, and in November, 1909, a judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the recovery of certain real property. Findings of fact and conclusions of law and the judgment were all signed by the judge who tried the case, and the judgment was duly entered by the clerk in his judgment docket. The complaint also averred the plaintiff's right of recovery of 60 shares of stock of the La Habra Water Company. It alleged an unwarranted refusal of the defendant to execute and deliver to the plaintiff a deed of conveyance to the real property "or deliver the 60 shares of water stock of the La Habra Water Company mentioned in the said contract." The prayer of the complaint also sought a transfer and delivery to plaintiff of these 60 shares. The answer denied the right of plaintiff to a conveyance of the real estate or a transfer of the water stock. By its findings the court declared the contract to be as plaintiff had pleaded, the contract containing the clause, "With this land there is to be given 60 shares of the La Habra water stock." It further declared that plaintiff had duly tendered performance and the defendant had refused to make the deed of conveyance and to deliver the 60 shares of stock of the La Habra Water Company mentioned in said contract. The conclusions of law, while pronouncing upon plaintiff's right to a deed of the real estate upon payment of the money contemplated by the contract, were silent upon the question of the water stock, making no reference thereto whatsoever. The court, as has been said, signed these findings of fact and conclusions of law. It also signed a form of judgment.

[1, 2] Under our procedure the court pronounces its decision, which in fact is the oral judgment in the case. This judgment is to derive its support from written findings of fact and conclusions of law signed by the court. The ministerial duty of the clerk is to enter a judgment in conformity with the decision of the court, evidenced by the signed findings and conclusions. In the generality of cases, to an intelligent clerk, the conclusions of law will be sufficient guidance for the entry of a correct judgment. But it is eminently proper for the court to give to the clerk for his direction the form of judgment which the decision or oral judgment calls for. The court so did in this case and declares that this form of judgment contained an award of the stock to plaintiff.

[3] But to this appellant makes answer that the conclusions of law are silent upon plaintiff's right to receive the 50 shares of water stock, and that this absence of a conclusion of law is controlling upon the proposition that the court's original judgment did not and could not have contained a decree awarding it to plaintiff. In this, however, appellant ascribes too much potency to a mere conclusion of law. The judgment itself controls, and if the findings support the judgment, the mere absence or omission of a specific conclusion of law will not avail to defeat a judgment otherwise properly given. Indeed, it will be held that the conclusion of law is at once embraced and expressed in the mandate of the judgment. In this case, then, we see that by his complaint plaintiff sought a transfer of this stock. By the prayer of his complaint he asked for it. We see that the court found the contract by which defendant agreed to convey this stock to be a valid and subsisting contract, and decreed the terms upon which defendant should be made to perform his contract. If in truth then, though the conclusions of law may have been silent upon the matter, the court in its oral judgment did decree that defendant should comply with the terms of his contract, this judgment necessitated a transfer of the stock as well as a conveyance of the real property.

And so we come to the final consideration. The form of judgment which the judge signed contained the following language:

"And that upon payment of said money hereinbefore provided for, said defendant W. J. Hole be also required to transfer and deliver to this plaintiff 60 shares of the stock of the La Habra Water Company as provided in said contract mentioned and set forth in said finding."

These words were canceled by ink lines drawn through them. Opposite them upon the margin was the initial "N," the final initial of Mr. Noyes, attorney for plaintiff, and written in between the lines thus canceled was the following: "Agreed upon by the said plaintiff and W. J. Hole." As to the meaning of this there can be no dispute. It means that in this draft of the form of a judgment provision was made for the transfer by defendant to plaintiff of 60 shares of the stock of the La Habra Water Company; that by consent of the attorneys of both parties this provision of the judgment was eliminated by cancellation from this prepared form. (At least such is the declaration of the interpolated writing, though whether or not the writing was made by the authority of defendant does not appear upon the face of it, and the assent of plaintiff's attorney is indicated by his initial.)

It would seem clear, moreover, that this provision was canceled before entry by the clerk of his judgment, for otherwise it is to be taken for granted that the judgment which he entered would have contained this provision, as it did contain with exactness everything else embraced in the form of the judgment presented to him. From the judgment thus entered defendant took his appeal, as he did also from the order denying his motion for a new trial. His appeals were denied by a decision of the court of appeal rendered in February, 1912. After the decision of the appellate court affirming the judgment and order appealed from, plaintiff received and accepted from the clerk the deed to the property which had been deposited with the clerk by the defendant, and the defendant received from the clerk the moneys called for by the judgment, which moneys had been deposited by the plaintiff with the clerk. This was in February, 1912, and thereafter, in June, 1912, on ex parte application plaintiff secured from the judge, who tried the cause, an amendment to the judgment, which amendment ordered defendant to transfer to plaintiff 60 shares of the capital stock of the La Habra Water Company, the order of the court being in the following language:

"It appearing to the court that the judgment heretofore entered by the clerk in the above-entitled action, is not a correct memorial of the judgment and order rendered and announced by this court in the above-entitled action, in that said judgment as rendered and announced by said court provided that the defendant transfer and deliver to the plaintiff herein 60 shares of the stock of the La Habra Water Company, as provided in the contract mentioned and set forth in the findings; and whereas, through inadvertence and a clerical error, there was omitted from the record of said judgment, any direction specifically ordering defendant to deliver said 60 shares of stock of the La Habra Water Company to defendant upon payment of the money directed to be paid by said judgment:

"Now, therefore, it is hereby ordered that the judgment heretofore entered by the clerk in this action on November 4, 1909, be, and the same is, hereby corrected to conform to the actual judgment announced and intended by the court, by adding to said judgment, after line 30 on page 3 thereof, the following: 'It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that upon payment of said money hereinbefore provided for, said defendant W. J. Hole be also required to transfer and deliver to this plaintiff 60 shares of the stock of the La Habra Water Company as provided in said contract mentioned and set forth in said findings.' That this order correcting the record of said judgment be entered nunc pro tunc to appear of record as of November 4, 1909, that being the date when said judgment was originally made and entered.

"Done in open court this 14th day of June, 1912. Z. B. West, Judge."

[4] Here, then, is an amendment to a judgment, which amendment involves the transfer of property and of property rights made not only after the original judgment had become final, but after it had been satisfied. The law governing the power of the court at nisi prius in dealing with its own judgments is well settled. The court may always amend the entered judgment to make it conform to the decision which the court actually rendered (Homeseekers' Loan Association v. Gleeson, 133 Cal. 312, 65 Pac. 617; City & County v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 Pac. 281); but it may never subsequently amend by new modifications or enlargements of the judgment which it originally rendered, or of the judgment record which is in accordance with the decision which was actually rendered.

It may not make the judgment express anything not embraced in the court's decision, even though the proposed amendment contains matters which ought to have been so pronounced. Freeman on Judg. § 70, note 2; First Nat. Bank of Fresno v. Dusy, 110 Cal. 70, 42 Pac. 476; O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 428, 57 Pac. 225.

[5, 6] Indisputably the amendment here made does change the judgment in important particulars. Indisputably it is an amendment which, if it be new matter, the court had no power to make, even though it declares in conformity with what the court originally should have decided but did not decide. But, upon the other hand, if the matter of the amendment was a part of the original decision of the court and through misprision of the clerk was not entered, it was within the power of the court to amend the record of the judgment so as to have it comport with verity and speak the decision which the court actually made. In the order amending the judgment which is here appealed from the court declared that the judgment was ordered amended under the conditions and circumstances last set forth. It declared, in effect, that the judgment was amended not by the insertion of new matter, but by correcting the record to have it contain all of the matters originally decreed. We must treat the form of judgment which the judge signed as setting forth the oral judgment or decision of the court, which it was the duty of the clerk to enter. It was the duty of the clerk to enter it, not because it was in writing signed by the judge, but because it was in fact the oral judgment which the court pronounced. Such is the tenor of the court's declaration in making the order of amendment. If the court was mistaken in this it was open to the appellant upon his motion to vacate the order so to show. He did not undertake to show the contrary, but upon this appeal rests upon the strictly legal proposition that the court had no power to make the amendment in question because it was the introduction of new matter in modification and enlargement of the judgment.

The court's declaration that it is not new matter, if assailed at all, is therefore unsuccessfully assailed, and the orders appealed from are affirmed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; A. I. McSorley, Judge.

Action by the California-Calaveras Mining Company against John A. Walls and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Metson, Drew & Mackenzie, of San Francisco, John Hancock, of San Andreas, and Horatio Alling, of Oakland, for appellants. Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, Clarence S. Darrow, of Chicago, Ill., Chickering & Gregory and Evan Williams, all of San Francisco, and Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. The plaintiff corporation sued for a decree canceling a promissory note for $100,000 delivered by it to defendant

Walls, to have annulled a trust deed made by it to defendant Wilson, as trustee, to secure said note, to have canceled certain stock certificates issued by plaintiff and held by defendants Manson, Jarmuth, and McGuinn, and for an accounting by Manson to plaintiff. Manson was served by publication, and, failing to appear, his default was entered. The action was dismissed as to the defendant McGuinn. Jarmuth, Walls, and Wilson answered and contested the right of the plaintiff to recover. Plaintiff obtained a decree canceling said note, annulling said trust deed, canceling all stock certificates issued by the corporation to and held by Manson and Jarmuth, and also a judgment against Manson and Jarmuth for $83,500. Defendants Walls and Wilson appeal.

The findings are very full, and as far as practical we epitomize them; as also other facts in the case.

The court found that defendants Manson and Jarmuth, prior to January 7, 1907, became familiar with a mining and ranch property, consisting of 7,200 acres, located in Calaveras and Sutter counties in this state, the property of a Mrs. Caroline Wright, which she was offering for sale for $120,000, and a sale of which at that figure they had discussed with her. About January 7, 1907, Manson, for himself and Jarmuth, visited Chicago for the purpose of interesting parties there in the purchase of this property. He got into conference with David T. Adams, J. H. James, Edmund D. Brigham, John T. Jones, and Paul Brown, residents of Chicago, and hereafter to be designated the Chicago parties. He sought the co-operation of these parties with himself and Jarmuth in the purchase of this property. Several meetings and conferences were had between them on the subject, in which Manson stated that he had a verbal option on the property for $250,000 but was endeavoring to get it for less; that he, being well acquainted with its owner, could purchase it for less than any one else; that he would, however, require Jarmuth's services to effect it, but that he, Manson, would attend to the entire matter for the benefit of all of them should they join with him in purchasing it. Some of the Chicago parties wanted to visit the property, but Manson protested against their doing so, stating that the owner was an old woman, highly nervous, and that if she learned that Eastern parties were trying to purchase the property, she would become excited and raise its price. As a result of these conferences, the Chicago parties believing all these representations of Manson, it was agreed that they and Manson and Jarmuth should co-operate in the purchase of it. As the most convenient way of accomplishing this it was agreed between them that a corporation should be formed, and stock thereof distributed to all associated in the enterprise; that all of them would compose the corporation; that the Chicago parties would finance the corporation to be so formed by purchasing, or causing to be purchased, such of its stock as would be necessary to place sufficient funds in the treasury to pay certain promissory notes to be issued by the corporation; that Manson should act in the organization of the corporation, attend entirely to the purchase of the mining property, transfer it to the corporation, and, on the assumption of the truth of Manson's statement that the least price at which it could be purchased by him from its owner for the benefit of said proposed corporation was $250,000, that in payment therefor the corporation should make and deliver to Manson its three promissory notes for $100,000 each; the $50,000 above the actual price of the mining property to be paid to Manson by the corporation, as he insisted it should be, as his profit for his services in attending to the securing of the property for the mutual benefit of all concerned and the formation of the corporation to take it over. This arrangement being reached between the parties, on January 7, 1907, a written agreement for the purpose of carrying it out was signed by Manson and Brigham, the latter as representing himself and the other Chicago parties in the transaction. This agreement provided: That Manson should organize the plaintiff corporation in California with a capital stock of $2,500,000 divided into 500,000 shares of the par value of $5 each. That its directors should consist of seven members to be selected by Manson. That on the organization of the corporation Manson should transfer to it the mining property and in full payment therefor the corporation should issue to Manson all its capital stock fully paid up and nonassessable, and deliver to him three of its promissory notes for $100,000 each without interest, due, respectively, February 5, 1907, March 5, 1907, and April 5, 1907. That of this 500,000 shares of the capital stock Manson should transfer to the treasury of the corporation 150,000 shares as a fund for future use by the corporation. That 199,965 shares of said 500,000 shares should be deposited with a trustee to be delivered on payment of said three promissory notes, as follows: 50,000 shares to Brigham, 107,143 shares to Brigham for himself and his assignees, and 42,822 shares to Manson. That, further, of said 100,000 shares Manson should forthwith turn into the treasury of the corporation 150,000 shares to be issued by it to Paul Brown, as trustee, to be sold by him for the corporation at par on certain terms of payment specified in the agreement.

On the execution of this agreement Manson immediately came to California, and he and Jarmuth visited Mrs. Wright. She had given an option to Jarmuth on this property for $120,000 before any negotiations were entered into with the Chicago parties, and would have sold it at any time for that figure. At this conference Mrs. Wright agreed to sell it to Manson for $120,000—$75,000 in cash, and the delivery of certain bonds and a note and mortgage held by Jarmuth representing the balance—and on January 21, 1907, deposited in escrow with a certain bank a deed to Manson of the property to be delivered to him on payment of the money and delivery of the bonds and note and mortgage on or before February 10, 1907. On January 21, 1907, Manson caused to be carried out the written agreement between himself and the Chicago parties as far as its literal terms are concerned. He caused the corporation plaintiff to be organized, conveyed to it one-half of the mining property, and in consideration therefor the corporation issued and delivered to him all its capital stock. At an adjourned meeting on the same day he conveyed to the corporation the other half of the property, and delivered to it as treasury stock of the corporation 300,000 of said shares issued to him and received from the corporation the three promissory notes for $100,000, each payable at the respective dates without interest as provided in the agreement. The other terms of the agreement as to the distribution of the shares of stock by Manson and the issuance by the corporation of the treasury stock to Brown were also carried out.

Prior to the maturity of the first note due February 7, 1907, Paul Brown, as trustee of said treasury stock of the corporation, obtained from various persons who had subscribed therefor the sum of $90,000, the larger part of which was subscribed by the Chicago parties, including himself. This $90,000, with $10,000 subscribed by Manson, was deposited with the treasurer of the corporation to take up the first note, and was paid over to Manson for that purpose. Manson paid $75,000 of this money to take up the Wright deed to him of this property deposited in escrow. The second note, maturing March 5, 1907, was paid on May 20, 1907, the money to pay it being received from the Chicago parties and the other purchasers of treasury stock of the corporation from Brown as trustee. The third note, maturing April 5, 1907, was not paid, and Manson caused the corporation to issue a renewal note to the defendant Walls with the trust deed, both here involved, on his statement to it that prior to the maturity of said original note of April 5, 1907, he had sold and indorsed it to said Walls. This renewal note, dated April 6, 1907, was for $100,000, payable three years after date, with interest at 8 per cent. per annum. Manson during all these times and from the organization of the corporation was in control of it and was its president. Subsequent to the issuance by the corporation of this renewal note and trust deed, the Chicago parties, as stockholders of the corporation, and other stockholders thereof who had contributed money for the purchase of the stock of the corporation to pay the purchase price of said mining property, discovered the truth of the facts as to the purchase price paid for said property by Manson, and, having obtained control of the corporation, brought this action in its name. As to the original note of April 5, 1907, the court found that Walls was not a purchaser of it for value, in good faith, without notice before its maturity, or at all; that in the transaction respecting the renewal note he was the agent of Manson and a mere "dummy" for him; that the original note was never indorsed or delivered to Walls until after its maturity; that Manson at all times after its issuance retained possession of it.

While many other findings were made by the court, still those we have referred to are the only ones necessary for consideration in determining the merits of the appeal of these particular appellants Walls and Wilson.

On these findings the decree herein was entered in favor of plaintiff.

As grounds for reversal it is urged: First, that no fraud upon the plaintiff corporation was either alleged or shown affecting the validity of the notes given; second, that the original note due April 5, 1907, for the renewal of which the trust deed and note here in question were given, was indorsed and delivered by Manson to Walls for value before maturity and without notice; that Walls is the owner and holder of said trust deed note, and the findings of the court to the contrary are not sustained by the evidence; third, that the trial court was without jurisdiction to adjudicate the alleged fraud of Manson or make any decree for the cancellation of the trust deed note and annulment of the trust deed, as it appears on the face of the judgment roll that Manson was not served with summons in this action.

It is to be noted that no attack whatever is made upon the findings that the representations and statements made to his associates, the Chicago people, by Manson, the prime mover in the promotion with them of the plaintiff corporation, for the express purpose of acquiring this mining and ranch property, as to the true price he could acquire it from its owner for the benefit of the proposed corporation they were to organize, were fraudulent and false. The sole contention of appellants is that, admitting this be fully proven, yet such fraud could in no way taint the transaction between Manson and the corporation itself so as to give the corporation as such a right of action to set aside its obligations on the notes. They concede that if at the time this mining property was exchanged by Manson for the stock and notes of the corporation, there were stockholders either nonassenting to the transaction or assenting by reason of ignorance of the true facts, and the transaction presented a secret profit to Manson, that a cause of action would arise in favor of the corporation. But they claim no such situation is shown by the findings; that on the contrary a situation where when the transactions between Manson and the corporation were consummated there were no stockholders of the corporation save Manson himself; that in his transactions with it he was in reality the corporation itself because of his ownership of all its capital stock; that hence no other person was interested in the transactions save himself as both seller and purchaser of the property; that his knowledge as sole stockholder was knowledge by the corporation of all the facts respecting the property, and, as with such knowledge the corporation consented to the transaction between himself and it, no fraud was or could be practiced upon the corporation itself.

As far as the Chicago parties, the associates of Manson, in promoting the plaintiff corporation, are concerned, appellants insist that they are not entitled, as the stockholders of the corporation now, to invoke the aid of a court of equity in the name of the corporation to avoid the trust deed note; that as purchasers of stock subsequent to the incorporation of the plaintiff and the transfer of the property to it, they might have a right of action against Manson for his antecedent fraud practiced on them whereby they were induced to subsequently purchase stock, but that this was their individual right and remedy; that this, however, was not fraud for which the corporation itself could assert any right to set aside its note because, for the reasons first urged, the corporation itself was not defrauded.

Counsel for appellants marshal facts from the findings which they say present the situation which they have outlined, and cite a number of authorities to sustain their contention that, this being the situation, no fraud was perpetrated upon the plaintiff corporation of which it can complain. They rely on a line of cases including, among others, Parsons v. Hayes, 14 Abb. N. C. (N. Y.) 419; Old Dominion Copper Mining Co. v. Lewisohn, 210 U. S. 206, 28 Sup. Ct. 634, 52 L. Ed. 1025; Stratton's Independence, Ltd., v. Dines, 135 Fed. 449, 68 C. C. A. 161; In re Ambrose Lake Tin & Copper Mining Co., 14 Ch. Div. 390; Seymour v. Spring Forrest Cemetery Ass'n, 144 N. Y. 333, 39 N. E. 365, 26 L. R. A. 859; Tompkins v. Perry, Jones & Co., 96 Md. 560, 54 Atl. 254; Woodbury Heights Land Co. v. Loudenslager, 55 N. J. Eq. 78, 35 Atl. 436.

We will not particularly discuss these authorities. They undoubtedly sustain the contention of the appellants if the case made under the findings is the case they claim is shown therefrom. These cited cases were all cases, or principally such, where all the stockholders of a corporation turned over property to it at an excessive valuation, receiving in payment therefor shares of its capital stock based upon such excessive valuation and where these stockholders acquired the shares issued or participated in the profits derived from the transaction. There were no other stockholders or subscribers to the stock, nor was it contemplated that others should become future purchasers from the corporation of its stock, nor, in fact, were there any persons at all interested in the corporation or the transaction had with it save these stockholders participating in the transaction. Subsequent to the issuance of the stock to these participating stockholders they sold it to third parties, and actions were brought by the corporation in behalf of such subsequent purchasers on the theory that the corporation itself was defrauded through the original transaction. It was held that as the corporate entity at the time of these transactions consisted of these stockholders all participating in the transaction, the corporation had consented to it with full knowledge of the facts, and no fraud was committed on it of which the corporation itself could complain. But we do not think the rule of these authorities has any application to the case made out by the findings here, which we do not agree is the case counsel for appellants assumes is made. The findings, in our view, make quite a different case to which other principles than those contended for by appellants are to be applied. We will state those principles first, and subsequently apply them to the true case we consider is made under the findings. Premising, it is to be observed that in the transactions with reference to the purchase of this property by Manson from Mrs. Wright to be thereafter transferred to a corporation to be organized for that express purpose, Manson occupied the position of a promoter of the enterprise, associating with himself the Chicago parties to jointly carry out these purposes. By reason of this association and mutual co-operation a fiduciary relation was created between Manson and said associates, and if it can be said under the facts found that that fiduciary relation governed and controlled the conduct of Manson in securing the mining property, the organization of the plaintiff corporation to take it over and his transactions with the latter respecting it, we think, applying the principles to be referred to, a fraud was committed by him upon the corporation itself warranting it in the maintenance of this action; assuming, for the present, that the other finding of the court against the validity of the trust deed note to Walls is sustained by the evidence.

[1] In this court, in Lomita Land & Water Co. v. Robinson, 154 Cal. 36, 97 Pac. 10, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1106, the principle is laid down that:

"Promoters of a corporation formed for the express purpose of purchasing a particular piece of property, occupy a fiduciary relation to their cosubscribers, and are bound to truthfully declare to their associates any personal interest they may have in the matter of the purchase. Without such disclosures they cannot legally profit at the expense of their associates, and if they were guilty of any misrepresentations of facts or suppression of truth in relation to their personal interest in the proposed purchase, the corporation is entitled to set aside the transaction, or recover compensation for any loss which it has suffered."

And in Burbank v. Dennis, 101 Cal. 90, 35 Pac. 444, it is said:

"The substance of the law is that promoters are corporate fiduciaries. Transactions with their companies wherein they deal honorably, with full disclosure, and without seeking to influence the action of the corporation, will be upheld. But transactions in which they suppress or misrepresent material facts, or otherwise deceive the company, or corruptly control its action, are fraudulent, and the company may either elect wholly to set aside such transactions, or to recover the promoter's secret profits."

Thompson in his work on Corporations, section 457, speaking with reference to secret profits of a promoter, says:

"Promoters of a corporation occupy a fiduciary relation to it, and have no right to derive any advantage over other stockholders, without a full and fair disclosure of the transaction; and any secret profits which they acquire through promoting the corporation must be refunded, and may be recovered in equity by the corporation or its legal representative, and in many cases at law. Persons who organize a corporation for the purpose of working certain property are bound to disclose to persons who may be by them induced to join them in the company what the vendors of the property actually receive for it; and if, by deceiving the members of the company as to the actual price paid for the property, or if, by collusion with the vendors they are permitted to retain for themselves a portion of the purchase money, they must account to the company for the same in equity; or the company may maintain an action in assumpsit against them for the moneys so secretly reserved to themselves, as so much money had and received to its use. In like manner, persons who purchase property and then organize a company to purchase it from them stand in a fiduciary position towards such company, and must faithfully state to the company all material facts relating to the property, which would influence the company in deciding on the desirability of purchasing it. In such cases the owners of property who desire to create a company for the purpose of purchasing it from them are bound, if they wish to make a contract which will stand, to nominate independent directors, and to disclose to them the actual facts. The principle upon which courts of equity proceed in these cases is a very familiar one. The promoter of a company, like its directors, is deemed to sustain towards the members of the company the relation of a trustee towards his cestui que trust. This being so, he will not be permitted to speculate out of that relation, or to derive secret advantages from it. He is bound to disclose to them fully all material facts touching his relation to them, including the amount which he is to get for his services as promoter, usually called 'promotion money.'"

And continuing, the same author says:

"This principle is undoubtedly applicable to promoters of a corporation not yet in esse, though it may be difficult in strict logic to work out such a case upon the theory that they are trustees for a body which is not in esse, and which they are proposing to create. Perhaps the conclusion is better worked out upon the reasoning of a recent writer of reputation: 'Before any shares had issued, the existence of the company was a fiction. The shareholders really formed the company, each one becoming a member when he took his shares. While the contract for the purchase of the property was nominally in force from the time of its approval by the board of directors, yet it really took effect only after the shareholders had taken their shares. It then became binding on all the shareholders collectively, or, in other words, on the company. The fraud consisted in inducing the shareholders to enter into this contract in their collective capacity, and in using the funds belonging to the shareholders collectively in paying the purchase price. It is evident, therefore, that the injury to the shareholders was not an injury to the collective or corporate interests, and that the company was the proper complainant.' It seems, however, that the case cannot rest upon the idea of two parties to a trade dealing with each other at arm's length. While the promoters, at the time of making the offer, are not in a relation of trust and confidence with those to whom they make it, yet by the offer itself they propose to enter into such a relation with them; and this circumstance puts them under the same duty of making full and fair disclosures to them which they would be under if the trust relation had already been established. * * * The very suggestion made by associates to intending subscribers to the corporate shares, 'We are going to be your co-adventurers in this enterprise to be founded and prosecuted for the common profit of all,' implies an obligation on their part to deal openly and with the same fidelity which is demanded where a trust relation has been established."

These principles are enunciated and applied in adjudicated cases, among others: Simons v. Vulcan Oil & Refining Co., 61 Pa. 217, 100 Am. Dec. 628; Pittsburg Mining Co. v. Spooner, 74 Wis. 307, 42 N. W. 259, 17 Am. St. Rep. 149; South Joplin Land Co. v. Case, 104 Mo. 572, 16 S. W. 390; Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co., L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218; Colton Imp. Co. v. Richter, 26 Misc. Rep. 26, 55 N. Y. Supp. 486; Walker v. Pike County Land Co., 139 Fed. 609, 71 C. C. A. 593.

In South Joplin Land Co. v. Case, just cited, the court said:

"Persons who take an active part in procuring subscriptions, and in organizing a corporation or company, called 'promoters' occupy a position often difficult to define. When the owner of the property deals with those promoters, representing himself only * * * it is very clear he occupies no position of trust or agency. He may deal at arm's length, as in other cases, being liable, however, for his fraudulent conduct. But it is common practice for persons who own property, or who have acquired the right to purchase property, to project and form a corporation and induce others to become stockholders for the purpose of selling the property to the corporation at a profit. * * * But the persons who thus project and form a corporation, by soliciting and procuring others to subscribe for and take shares of stock, for the purpose of selling or turning over to the company property which they own, or have a right to acquire by executory contract, do occupy a double position. On the one hand they represent their own interest in respect to the disposition of the property. On the other they represent the proposed corporation. And persons who subscribe for stock have a right to do so upon the assumption that the promoters are using their knowledge, skill and ability for the benefit of the company. It is therefore clear on principle that promoters, under the circumstances just stated, do occupy a position of trust and confidence; and it devolves upon them to make full disclosure. * * * So it has been said in this country: 'The second principle is that where persons form such an association, or begin or start the project of one, from that time they do stand in a confidential relation to each other, and to all others who may subsequently become members or subscribers, and it is not competent for any of them to purchase property for the purpose of such a company, and then sell it at an advance without a full disclosure of the facts. They must account to the company for the profits, because it legitimately is theirs.' Oil Co. v. Densmore, 64 Pa. 43-50. * * * The point of most difficulty in this class of cases is as to the time when this fiduciary relation arises. As to this it has been well said: 'On the one hand it is quite plain that a fiduciary relation between a promoter and a company may exist long before the actual formation of a company by registration or otherwise. On the other hand, it is obvious that something must be done beyond a purchase and resale to constitute such relation—something must, it is submitted, be done by the promoter to impose upon him the duty of protecting the interests of those who ultimately form the company. He assumes this duty if he assumes to act for them, or if he induces them to trust him, or to trust persons who are under his control, and who are practically himself in disguise; he also assumes such duty if he calls the company into existence in order that it may buy what he has to sell; but he does not assume such duty by negotiating with persons who have themselves assumed that duty, and who are in no way under his influence.' 1 Lindl. Partn. (4th Ed.) 584."

At this point, and without discussing now the true relations between Manson and the Chicago parties in the entire transaction relative to the organization of the corporation and acquirement by it of this property, it is to be observed that by the antecedent oral agreement and understanding between Manson and the Chicago parties, and by the terms of the written contract between them, it was contemplated and intended that in the organization of the corporation future stockholders should be brought in; that treasury stock to the amount of 150,000 shares should be issued to Brown as trustee of the corporation, to be sold to third parties for the benefit of the corporation at prices and terms set out in the contract, and another 150,000 shares were to be held by the corporation as a fund for its future use, which, of course, involved a right in the corporation to sell it to future stockholders. There were then 150,000 corporate shares which the agreement expressly provided should be sold to constitute future stockholders in the corporation, and 150,000 shares additional subject to sale for such purpose, an aggregate of 300,000 shares, or three-fifths of the capital stock of the corporation. Brown actually did sell a very large portion of this treasury stock pursuant to the agreement.

[2] When in the promotion of a corporation to take over property for the benefit of the corporation it is contemplated by those organizing it that shares of its stock shall be offered for sale in order that others may become future stockholders in the corporation, such promoters in dealing with the corporation occupy a fiduciary relation to it for the benefit of such future stockholders, and the interests of such future stockholders are entitled to protection from concealed benefits or profits acquired by the promoters in their transactions with the corporation and to a full disclosure of the true facts of the purchase price of the property turned over to the corporation, and any advantage or benefits accruing to the promoters by failure to do so or concealment constitutes a fraud on the corporation. This principle is announced in Western State Life Ins. Co. v. Lockwood, 166 Cal. 185, 135 Pac. 496. That case involved the right of a corporation to sue its president for a profit obtained where under the organization of the corporation the taking in of future stockholders was directly contemplated. We quote only from that decision as declaring the principle under such circumstances. The court said:

"The very first duty of the directors of this corporation was to procure the necessary stock subscriptions to enable the corporation to commence and continue its business. They accepted this trust when they assumed the office of directors, and in the discharge of this trust they were practically 'promoters' of the corporation. The obtaining of such subscriptions was practically a part of the formation of the company. One who engages in such work is known as a promoter, and is subject to the obligations imposed upon promoters (citing cases). As said in 1 Thompson on Corporations, § 415, the word 'promoter' involves the idea of exertion for the purpose of floating a company, and also the idea of some duty towards the company imposed by, or arising out of, the position which the so-called promoter assumes towards it. It is thoroughly settled that promoters cannot make a secret profit out of the corporation—that they occupy a fiduciary relation to it, and to its stockholders and have no right to derive any advantage over other stockholders, without a full and fair disclosure of the transaction."

In the application of these principles there is no distinction between promoters of a corporation and its president or directors. In the case just quoted from this court quotes with approval the following from Bennett v. Havelock Electric Light, etc., Co., 21 Ont. L. R. 120:

"It has been argued in this case that the defendants are not liable, as they were in fact the only shareholders of the company at the time of the transaction, and because they, as shareholders, assented to what was done. This ignores the fact that, when there is intended to be an invitation to others to come in and take stock, the future shareholders are entitled to the protection of an absolute independent directorate and to full disclosure of the actual facts. There is no distinction between the position of promoters and directors in this respect; if any can be drawn, it must impose a more stringent obligation upon one occupying the position of director. The principles laid down in the decided cases accord with the dictates of honesty and fair play."

See, also, Erlanger v. New Sombrero Phos. Co., supra; Colton Imp. Co. v. Richter, supra; Camden Land Co. v. Lewis, 101 Me. 78, 63 Atl. 523; Pietsch v. Millbrath, 123 Wis. 647, 101 N. W. 388, 102 N. W. 342, 68 L. R. A. 945, 107 Am. St. Rep. 1017.

[3] Having set forth these principles we come now to a consideration and application of them to the facts found, and as we deem the true case is presented under them. It is not simply a case, as claimed by appellants, where an owner of property offers to transfer the property to the corporation for all its stock, and where in the transaction no one save himself as the owner of all the stock and property transferred for it is interested or to be considered. This was not the real or true situation shown by the findings. The case presented is in reality one where a promoter associates and co-operates with others in the organization of a corporation for the express purpose of having it take over certain property under the control of the promoter at its actual cost, it being intended and contemplated that in the organization of the corporation all those associated are to become stockholders in it, and other stockholders are to be invited to take stock in the corporation and where, in the transactions with the corporation so organized, the promoter makes a concealed profit on the transfer of the property to it. It is true that upon the organization of this corporation the form of the transaction respecting the transfer of the property to it was one between Manson as owner of all its stock and himself as having received in effect an option on the mining property transferred by him to it. The mere form, however, which the transaction between Manson and the corporation took may not be interposed to defeat what was the evident purpose and intent of all the parties interested in the organization of the corporation and the acquirement of the property by it. The court will look beyond the form which the transaction took and to its substance and the obvious intent of the parties in the entire matter for the purpose of preserving and securing the rights of the real parties in interest and to circumvent fraud. That a fiduciary relationship existed between Manson and the Chicago parties, his associates, at least prior to the actual organization of the corporation, in their mutual endeavor to promote its incorporation for the express purpose of taking over this property at the lowest figure at which it could be obtained as represented to his associates by Manson, and that the Chicago parties should finance the corporation and all parties be stockholders therein, is beyond question. But it is said by appellants that whatever fiduciary relation may have existed between Manson and these associates prior to the organization of the corporation, none existed between him and the corporation itself in the actual transaction respecting the transfer by him of the property to the latter. But this claim is not sound when the real situation is considered; the relation in which Manson and the associates stood to each other during the entire transaction both as to the organization of the corporation and the purchase by it of this property and in which it was contemplated they should all stand to the corporation upon its organization.

[4] Under the authorities which we have quoted the fiduciary relation of a promoter of a corporation to the corporation to be organized may exist long before its actual organization. As it may, so then we are satisfied that in the transactions here involved between Manson and the corporation it did exist. While by the terms of the contract of January 7, 1907, it was agreed by all the parties that the actual organization of the corporation should be left to Manson and all the stock be issued to him, it is apparent that this plan was determined on simply as a convenient method of effecting a transfer of the property to the corporation. The obvious purpose of the agreement with reference to issuance of capital stock of the corporation to him was in reality to make him simply a transferee for the benefit of the Chicago parties, his associates, in its organization as to a large portion of its stock, and as to a larger portion thereof he was simply a medium through which it should be redelivered to the corporation to constitute its treasury stock to be disposed of to future stockholders to be brought into the corporation. In fact, as is apparent from the terms of the contract itself, as well as the previous negotiations had between these parties, this was the entire purpose to be achieved through the organization of the corporation. Considering the relation of Manson to his associates from an equitable point of view, they were all to be considered as stockholders during Manson's negotiations with the corporation respecting the transfer of this property to it, notwithstanding that he was nominally the owner of all the stock. While nominally issued to Manson the stock was in reality acquired by him to a large extent for the benefit of his associates as intended stockholders with him in the corporation and still larger for the immediate benefit of the corporation as treasury stock to be sold to future stockholders. Very little of this stock was intended to be held by Manson himself. His prime interest in forming the corporation was to have it take over the property at a concealed and excessive valuation over its true price as represented by him; his associates and future stockholders to float and finance the corporation. Necessarily, as the scheme of the organization of the corporation contemplated, those who were to be the actual holders of this stock—the Chicago parties and purchasers of treasury stock of the corporation—were to contribute to its treasury the funds to make payment of the notes issued as the purchase price of the property, and to the extent that these stockholders through the fraudulent conduct of Manson were injured, it was an injury to the corporation as representing their collective or corporate interests. This being the true relation of the parties, the duty of Manson to his associates, as equitably constituting with himself stockholders in the corporation, as well as to the future stockholders which it was contemplated should be brought in, required the utmost good faith in his transactions with the corporation. Such duty towards it required that he should make no secret profit by misrepresenting the price to be paid for the property which he was to transfer to it. In disregard of this duty, and having by a violation of it fraudulently secured an unjust advantage in the transaction, the corporation had a right to maintain this action in all respects as it was brought, and particularly as far as its outstanding obligation represented by the trust deed and the note to Walls is concerned, to have them set aside as representing an unjust gain of Manson unless, as contended by Walls, he was a purchaser in good faith and indorsee before its maturity of the original note to Manson of which the trust deed note is a renewal.

[5] Now as to the finding that Walls was not a purchaser or indorsee for value before the maturity of the original note of April 5, 1906. Appellant claims that this finding is not sustained by the evidence.

Fraud in the inception of the original note in suit being shown, the burden was cast on Walls of proving that he was an innocent purchaser or indorsee of the note for value before maturity. Eames v. Crosier, 101 Cal. 260, 35 Pac. 873; Sinkler v. Siljan, 136 Cal. 356, 68 Pac. 1024. That Walls was not such a purchaser or indorsee before maturity, or at all, the court was warranted in finding on the testimony of Walls himself as to the details of the transaction under which he claims to have purchased it, without any consideration of other evidence which was given in the case tending to negative it. Manson and himself had been for years associated together in the "bucket shop" business and dealing together in stock speculations; their relations were very close and intimate; and they had many business transactions in common and trusted each other implicitly. As to the purchase of the original note Walls testified that shortly prior to April 5, 1906, he called on Manson about investing some money, and Manson told him that he had this original note for $100,000 falling due on the 5th of the month which he would sell him for its face value and on Manson's simple assurance that it was a safe purchase he agreed to take it. Walls did not see the note or know where it was. Manson wanted the full face value of the note as the purchase price payable at once or at the latest the next day. Walls testified that on the following day he got from his wife $47,000 of some $72,000 or $73,000 in currency, which for a long time had been kept in their house in a hard wood cedar chest, and $53,000 in currency which he took from his safe deposit box in a bank and forthwith paid Manson this money for the note. Manson then told him he did not think the original note would be paid at maturity but that a new note would be issued in place of it, to bear 8 per cent. interest. The original note bore no interest. After paying the money Walls told Manson to take charge of the original note. Later Manson told him that the original note had not been paid, and that he was going to give him a new note of the corporation signed by himself as president and by the secretary of the corporation. This he did, it being the trust deed note here involved. This trust deed note Walls did not put into any bank or safe deposit box, but carried in a wallet in his pocket for seven or eight months. He was not present when this renewal note was made out; that matter was attended to by Manson. Walls was not engaged in the business of buying notes or mortgages, and bought no other notes. The original note he claimed to have purchased he never had in his possession. Manson retained it. Manson did not testify on the trial, though he was accessible as a witness. Neither did the wife of Walls.

This narrative of Walls as to the circumstances surrounding the purchase of the original note was not such as to impress a court with a conviction that it was true. The trial court was not so impressed, and that court cannot be said to have fallen into any error in treating his story as incredible.

[6] While the general rule is that the contradicted testimony of a witness cannot be disregarded by a court, still this rule is subject to limitations. And where the testimony of a witness, though of a most positive character, is yet so improbable when tested by rules which govern men of ordinary capacity and intelligence in a given business transaction, a court may refuse to credit it. Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 113 Pac. 147.

Aside from the unusual circumstances of a sensible business man keeping a small fortune in currency in a wooden chest in his house, there are other circumstances impairing the credibility of the story of Walls. He was paying a large sum of money for this note, and it does not appear that he was a man of such wealth that whether he was making a judicious and safe investment was a matter of business indifference to him. According to his story, however, this would appear to be the fact. He knew nothing about the property of the plaintiff corporation or its financial resources or responsibility. He did not inquire as to its indebtedness by which he might have ascertained that there was a note for $100,000 prior to that which he claims he was purchasing which the corporation had not yet paid. In fact, he made no inquiries at all about the matter. His story, summarized, shows that he bought a note for $100,000 made by a corporation of which he knew nothing, a note which drew no interest and which might not be paid. He could derive no benefit from the transaction unless he purchased the note at a discount, which he testified he did not. After the purchase he paid no further attention to the matter, leaving it all to Manson. He did not even obtain possession of the original note, and never did have it, and, according to his own statement, in the interim between paying

Manson the money and receiving the trust deed note, Manson had the original note and his $100,000, and he had no receipt or any other writing to protect his interest should anything have happened. There were no witnesses to the transaction, no book entries by either of the parties, no receipts or memorandum, no bank account or other account of Walls showing that his funds had been decreased through payment of this $100,000. In fact, the transaction was so apart from the ordinary course of business as to warrant the court in concluding that the story of Walls was a fabrication and entitled to no credence, and that he was not a purchaser or indorsee of the original note of April 5, 1907, before maturity, or at all.

As to the attack upon the judgment against Manson it is sufficient to say that Manson has not appealed from the judgment and hence the validity of the judgment against him is not before us for determination.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. GUARANTY — 27 — CONSTRUCTION — INTENT OF PARTIES — EXTRINSIC EVIDENCE.

In construing a guaranty, like every other contract, the intent of the parties must, if possible, be ascertained from the instrument itself, and if it is doubtful under the terms of the instrument, resort may be had to the surrounding circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 28; Dec. Dig. 27.]

2. GUARANTY — 42 — CONSTRUCTION — CONDITION PRECEDENT.

A contract guarantying the account of a corporation provided the amount be due and presented by a certain date, expressly makes the presentation of the account by the specified date a condition precedent to the guarantor's liability, especially where the guarantor would be required to make a settlement with the principal debtor shortly after that date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 52; Dec. Dig. 42.]

3. CONTRACTS — 147 — CONSTRUCTION — CONDITION PRECEDENT.

While conditions precedent are not favored by the law, and are to be strictly construed against one relying thereon, the clearly expressed intent of the parties to declare a condition precedent cannot be disregarded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 730, 743; Dec. Dig. 147.]

4. GUARANTY — 42 — CONSTRUCTION — TIME AS ESSENCE.

Where the presentation of an account to the guarantor by a specified date was a condition precedent to his liability, time is of the essence of the contract, though not expressly made so.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. §§ 51, 52; Dec. Dig. 42.]

5. GUARANTY — 72 — LIABILITY OF GUARANTOR — CONDITION PRECEDENT — WAIVER.

Evasive answers by the guarantor to demands of payment made subsequent to the time fixed for the presentation of the account to him, are not a waiver of his right to rely on the condition precedent for the presentation of such accounts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 82; Dec. Dig. 72.]

6. GUARANTY — 85 — ACTIONS AGAINST GUARANTOR — PLEADING — WAIVER OF CONDITION.

The creditor cannot rely on a waiver by the guarantor of a condition precedent to his liability without specially pleading such waiver.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guaranty, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. 85.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Edwin Schwab against Henry S. Bridge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thomas E. Haven and Haven & Athearn, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Morrison, Cope & Brobeck and Morrison, Dunne & Brobeck, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action to recover upon a guaranty. The circumstances under which the contract was entered into are as follows: W. W. Foote, Jr., had inherited certain sums of money from the estate of his father, which money was held in trust and was to become due on December 7, 1905. While so held W. W. Foote assigned the funds to the defendant Henry S. Bridge, defendant herein, as security for advances made and to be made by Bridge to Foote. The Pacific Central Electric Company, of which Foote was the principal stockholder, became indebted to the John M. Klein Electric Company, and to secure this indebtedness Foote requested Bridge to guarantee the account. In pursuance of this request Bridge signed the following guaranty:

"I will guarantee the account of Pacific Central Electric Company to the amount of $1,500—provided the amount may be due and presented to me by December 3, 1905. This guaranty in place of a former one of $1,000—in other words, my guaranty is not to exceed $1,500.

"[Signed] Henry S. Bridge."

A considerable portion of the indebtedness, for which the guaranty was given, was not paid; and on October 31, 1907, the contract of guaranty was assigned to Edwin Schwab, who brought this action to recover judgment for the sum of $1,500, with interest from the 4th day of December, 1905.

In defense of the action it was the claim of defendant in the court below that the contract of guaranty sued upon was a conditional one, dependent upon presentation of a demand, and that such presentation and demand be made within the time limited in the proviso of the guaranty; and, further, that the time of performance being part of a condition precedent, time was of the essence of the guaranty; and as the demand was not made until after the time specified, no liability accrued upon the contract. Plaintiff, on the other hand, insisted that not only was the proviso relied upon as a defense not made a condition precedent by its terms, but that the time therein set forth was not made expressly of the essence of the contract, nor was it to be implied therefrom.

The trial court, while finding that no statement of the account was presented until December 29, 1905, determined that it was not the intention of the parties to the guaranty that the proviso should be a condition precedent to the liability of the guarantor, and that such proviso was not a condition precedent, and, further, that it was not the intention of the parties that time was to be of the essence of the contract, and that time was not of its essence. Judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $1,435.55, interest and costs. The main question therefore presented by this appeal is the interpretation of the guaranty executed by the defendant.

[1, 2] A contract of suretyship is to be construed the same as other contracts for the purpose of determining the intention of the parties. To ascertain this intent resort is first had to the contract itself; and if the intention of the parties is doubtful under the terms of the instrument, resort may be had to the surrounding circumstances to determine its meaning. Here the words employed are in themselves express and precise, and clearly support the contention of the defendant, that presentation of the account due and within the time specified was intended as a condition precedent. The language of the proviso expressly declares that liability will accrue, provided the amount may be due and presented December 3, 1905. Where a contract of suretyship stipulates that notice shall be given to the surety of the principal's default, failure to comply with the condition or to give notice within the time specified will prevent recovery from the surety (U. S. Fidelity & G. Co. v. Rice, 148 Fed. 206, 78 C. C. A. 164; 32 Cyc. 176, and cases cited).

[3] While it is true that conditions precedent are not favored by the law, and are to be strictly construed against one seeking to avail himself of them (Antonelle v. Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 309-315, 73 Pac. 966), it is equally true that parties to a contract may, if they think proper, agree that any matter shall be a condition precedent; and if words are used in the contract so precise, express, and strong that such intention only is compatible with the terms employed, a court can only give effect to such declared intention of the parties. The only question in every case is whether such intention is so declared; and where such intention is sufficiently expressed to make the fulfillment of the act a condition precedent, it will be one. 2 Elliott on Contracts, § 1580; Nat. Surety Co. v. Long, 125

Fed. 887, 60 C. C. A. 623. While, as before stated, the intention of the parties to this contract is sufficiently expressed in the instrument itself, the facts and circumstances surrounding its execution, if considered, strengthen the conclusion reached. The fund that Bridge was to receive became due on the 7th day of December; and it is apparent that Bridge intended that he should be notified of the amount due by presentation to him before that time in order that he might protect himself by retaining in his settlement with Foote sufficient funds to meet any liability that had accrued under his guaranty. In contracts of this character, where the terms employed are clear and certain, and there is nothing to show a contrary intention, the liability of a surety cannot be extended by implication beyond the terms of his contract. London & San Francisco Bank v. Parrott, 125 Cal. 472, 58 Pac. 164, 73 Am. St. Rep. 64.

[4] The contention of plaintiff that the time therein set forth in the proviso is not expressly made of the essence of the contract is without merit. Concluding, as we do, that it was the intention of the parties to make presentation of the amount a condition precedent, time of necessity becomes of the very essence of the contract, it being the essential part of the proviso itself.

[5] The further claim that the conduct and language of the defendant show that he did not consider the requirement as a condition precedent, and that if he had ever so considered it he waived its fulfillment, is equally untenable. The statements relied upon in no way constitute a waiver. They consist of evasive answers to demands of payment made upon him under the guaranty and subsequent to the time specified for the performance of the condition precedent, and do not show any condition of facts inconsistent with the intention of defendant to rely upon the condition.

[6] Besides this, no waiver was pleaded. Aronson v. Frankfort, etc., Ins. Co., 9 Cal. App. 473, 479, 99 Pac. 537.

For the reasons given the judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. BURNS. (Cr. 291.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 24, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court June 21, 1915.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW § 519 — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER.

On the trial of an Indian for homicide, it appeared that the sheriff, after interviewing other Indians who were also under arrest, told accused that the other Indians said accused fired the fatal shot, and that he had sufficient evidence to convict accused, and he ought to tell the truth. The sheriff denied making any threats or promises, or using undue pressure, and there was no evidence of threats or promises or any improper influence to secure a confession. Held, that the admission of the confession of accused was not error, as it could not be said that it was not voluntary.

2. CRIMINAL LAW § 531 — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS—PRELIMINARY PROOF.

Evidence of extrajudicial confessions are never admissible unless the prosecution shows previously to its reception that they were freely and voluntarily made and without any previous inducement or offer of leniency in punishment or by reason of any intimidation or threat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1212–1217; Dec. Dig. § 531.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW § 519 — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER.

To be admissible, an extrajudicial confession must not have been extracted by any sort of threats or violence nor obtained by any direct or implied promise, however slight, nor by the exertion of any improper influence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1163–1174; Dec. Dig. § 519.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW § 532 — EVIDENCE — CONFESSIONS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Whether a confession is free and voluntary is a preliminary question to be determined by the trial court, and a considerable measure of discretion must be allowed that court in determining it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1218; Dec. Dig. § 532.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW § 1144—EVIDENCE—PRESUMPTIONS.

In a prosecution for homicide, where it appeared that accused testified at the coroner's inquest, it would be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that he appeared and testified voluntarily.

6. CRIMINAL LAW § 1169—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF CONFESSION.

The admission, on a trial for homicide, of a confession by accused, even though not voluntary, was not prejudicial error, where he voluntarily testified to the same effect at the coroner's inquest.

7. CRIMINAL LAW § 1186—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, provides that no judgment shall be set aside or new trial granted in any criminal case for misdirection of the jury, etc., unless the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of resulted in a miscarriage of justice. On a trial for homicide the court, in response to a request from the jury after their retirement, charged as to a confession by accused that the court admitted the evidence on the ground that, if it were true, the confession was voluntary; that, if the evidence was true, the question for the jury to determine was whether they believed beyond any question that it was true; that the court decided that, if the evidence was true, the confession was voluntary; and that, if the jury agreed upon what the sheriff testified and agreed it was true, the confession was voluntary. Held that, if this was susceptible of the construction that the court found the confession to be true as a necessary legal prerequisite to its admission, it was not prejudicial error, where the evidence, independent of the confession, would have supported a conviction for murder in the first degree, but accused was convicted only of manslaughter.

8. HOMICIDE ¶244 — SELF-DEFENSE — EVIDENCE.

On a trial for homicide, the evidence tended to show that accused left a tent where he and deceased had a quarrel, went to his own tent or camp, procured his rifle, and unnecessarily returned to a point near the tent where deceased was and shot deceased when he left the tent. There was evidence that, when deceased left the tent, he picked up a hop pole and started towards two persons, saying that he was going up to club them, and that accused was standing near such persons, though, it being dark, they were unable to see him, and that as deceased did this accused fired. Held, that there was no ground upon which accused could justly invoke the plea of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 507-509; Dec. Dig. ¶244.]

9. HOMICIDE ¶340—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Even though an instruction on self-defense might have been technically pertinent to the case, the claimed inaccuracy in an instruction that it was the duty of accused to avoid killing deceased if he could do so with perfect safety to himself or his person was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-717, 720; Dec. Dig. ¶340.]

10. HOMICIDE ¶300 — INSTRUCTIONS — APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

An instruction that the plea of self-defense was not available to a defendant who had sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus by his own wrongful acts create a real or apparent necessity for killing his adversary, was pertinent to the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614, 616-620, 622-630; Dec. Dig. ¶300.]

11. HOMICIDE ¶340 — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that the plea of self-defense was not available to a defendant, who had sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus by his own wrongful acts create a real or apparent necessity for killing his adversary, was not prejudicial to accused, even though not strictly applicable to the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Fox Burns was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. J. Weldon and Charles Kasch, both of Ukiah, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant, having been charged by information filed by the district attorney of Mendocino county with the crime of murder, was adjudged guilty by the jury of the crime of manslaughter, and he brings the cause to this court on an appeal from both the judgment and the order denying his application for a new trial. The homicide occurred in a hop field of a Mr. Hildreth in Mendocino county, on the night of the 18th day of September, 1914. The defendant, who is an Indian, with other Indians and a number of white persons, was, at the time of the homicide, engaged in picking hops. It appears that among those so engaged was a woman by the name of Rosie Judd. She was living in a tent, a temporary affair, erected for the purpose of use during the hop-picking season. The Indian hop pickers maintained a camp several hundred yards distant from the tent of the Judd woman.

On the night in question the deceased, Chester C. Rich, who was also a hop picker and engaged in that work up to the time of the homicide in the Hildreth fields, visited the Judd tent at about 10 o'clock on the night of the killing. He was accompanied by one William Mitchell, another hop picker. Gathered at the Judd tent then were the deceased, Mitchell, a man named Binkley, all three white men, and several Indians. The deceased had a bottle of whisky in his possession, and all then present in the Judd tent drank more or less of the liquor, none of them, however, getting under the influence thereof to any great degree. Within a brief time after the deceased and his companion reached Rosie Judd's tent, Fox Burns, the defendant, put in an appearance. At this time Tony Bell, an Indian, and deceased were engaged in gambling for money at a game known as the "grass game." The deceased accused Bell of cheating at the game, and a quarrel followed, each calling the other a s—n of a b—h. Burns, during the game, although not then playing at it, interjected remarks about the playing, when the deceased told him to keep his "d—m mouth shut," and this seems to have provoked an exchange of opprobrious epithets between the two men. A little later, however, the deceased and the defendant played at the game, the latter wagering his hat. The deceased won the game and the hat, but returned the latter to the defendant, saying that he had no use for it. The deceased then challenged Tony Bell for another game, and, accepting the challenge, Bell placed a dollar on the ground, on which, it seems, the game is usually played among the Indians. The deceased thereupon grabbed the dollar and put it into his pocket. Another quarrel between the deceased and Bell ensued, each abusing the other in scurrilous language. Almost immediately after the happening of this last circumstance the defendant, Bell, and an Indian named Ed Switzer left the tent, the defendant preceding the others a few seconds or perhaps a minute. Thereafter, and within a very short space of time, the deceased and Mitchell and an Indian, Dave Poe by name, started to leave the tent, Poe being a little ahead of the deceased and Mitchell, and just as they had reached the outside the Judd woman called Mitchell and requested him to return and light her lantern or lamp. Mitchell returned into the tent, and the deceased and Poe remained outside. While Mitchell was engaged in the act of lighting the lantern, a shot was fired, and Rich received the contents of the weapon and a mortal wound, a rifle ball having entered his abdomen and presumably penetrated the stomach and intestines. Immediately after the shooting a messenger was dispatched for a physician, and Dr. Cleland responded, but found that Rich had expired before his arrival at the scene of the homicide. The doctor made only a superficial examination of the wound; that is, such an examination only as enabled him to ascertain the point of entrance of the bullet into the body. A hat was lying on the ground a short distance from where the body lay, and this the doctor picked up and carried to Ukiah, where, later in the day, he delivered it into the possession of the sheriff.

The testimony, while not strictly consistent on some points which may well be characterized as of minor importance, is, generally, marked by no conflict as to the circumstances under which the killing was committed.

The night was very dark, and a drizzling rain was falling. Tony Bell testified that, while he and Switser were on their way to the Indian camp, and before they had proceeded no farther than 40 yards from the tent of Rosie Judd, they met the defendant going in the direction of the Judd tent. At the same time, having looked back, they saw the deceased coming toward them. After the defendant had passed them he heard him (the defendant) say: "Come on out; I'll fix you." He heard no reply to the challenge, but immediately thereafter heard the report of a gun and saw a flash from the explosion, instantly following which he heard the exclamation, "Oh!" in a loud tone of voice, and saw the deceased fall to the ground. Some one then hastily fled from the spot and in a direction from Burns' camp.

Dave Poe, an Indian, testified that he was standing on the outside of and near the entrance to the Judd tent when the deceased came out of said tent; that at that time Mitchell's lantern was standing on the ground near the tent and was lighted; that he saw Bell and Switser standing together a short distance from the tent, and the defendant back of them a short distance; that the deceased, a moment after leaving the inside of the tent, and after some words with Poe, picked up a hop pole of about ten feet in length, and, with the pole in his hands, started in the direction of the spot where Bell and Switser were standing, saying, as Poe expressed it, "that he was going up to club them fellows out there." The deceased had proceeded only a short distance, said Poe, when a shot was fired, and the deceased, with an exclamation, fell to the ground.

Ed Switser testified that he saw the deceased, with a club in his hands, coming in the direction of where he and Bell were standing, and at the same time heard some one say, "Come on, you s—n of a b—h." Thereupon the witness heard the report of a gun, and saw the deceased fall. He said that the voice of the person using the language, "Come on, you s—n of a b—h," he thought was that of the defendant. He said, however, that he did not see the defendant at that time, and did not know who fired the shot, but, he said, he heard some one running immediately after the shot, and that whoever he was "went around through the alfalfa field."

The sheriff of Mendocino county testified that early on the morning following the night of the homicide he, accompanied by his deputy, Oscar Weger, went to the hop field, and thence to the Indian camp. He found all the Indians, including the defendant, lying on the floor of their cabin asleep. He awoke and proceeded to interrogate them concerning the shooting. He placed several of the Indians, the defendant among them, under arrest. The sheriff had taken with him to the scene of the homicide the hat which, as above explained, Dr. Cleland had found lying near the body of the deceased. When the defendant, after having been aroused from his sleep by the sheriff, had finished "dressing," that officer asked him if he had a hat, to which question he replied in the negative. The sheriff then showed him the hat referred to and asked him if it was his, and he replied that it was, and received it from the sheriff and placed it upon his head. The Indians were taken to the county jail at Ukiah, and shortly thereafter, and on the same day, in the office of the sheriff, the latter and his deputy interviewed the other Indians, and finally the defendant, about the killing of Rich, and sought to secure a statement from the latter of what he knew of the homicide. After some little time, it appears, the sheriff, having asked the defendant what disposition he had made of his rifle (no weapon having been found in the defendant's camp at the time of the arrest), the accused replied that he had thrown the gun in the brush near the scene of the shooting. Later in the day the sheriff and his deputy, accompanied by the defendant, started for the hop field. On the way out, the defendant, although up to that time stoutly denying any knowledge of the shooting or the identity of the author of it, said to the officers:

"You white men would do the same thing, too, if us Indians come around you bothering your women; you would kill us, too."

Arriving at the hop field, the defendant guided the officers to a point in the brush about 75 yards from the Judd tent, and himself went into the brush and found and delivered to the sheriff a rifle. While out on this trip the defendant, so the sheriff testified, "told us all about it," referring to the killing. The sheriff further testified that the defendant, at the coroner's inquest, testified that he shot and killed Rich.

Deputy Sheriff Weger corroborated the sheriff upon what occurred between the sheriff and the defendant at the first interview in the sheriff's office and as to the finding of the gun and the circumstances thereof. This witness said that he really heard no confession of guilt by the defendant either on the way to the hop field or on their way back to Ukiah; but, he said, the defendant repeatedly spoke about going to San Quentin, saying, among other things, that, as he had to work anyway, he might as well work at that prison as elsewhere. Both the sheriff and his deputy testified that the gun or rifle, when found in the brush, contained one empty shell and two cartridges.

The above constitutes a statement in substance of the more important testimony produced by the people in support of the charge set forth in the information, and, while no claim is here made that the evidence is not sufficient to uphold the verdict, thus we have presented the testimony here for the purpose of the consideration and decision of certain points made by the defendant in support of his appeals.

The defendant himself did not take the witness stand, but introduced some proof tending to establish his position in the case that the deceased was a man of bad reputation for peace and quiet; that is, that he was of a quarrelsome and pugnacious disposition, particularly when under the influence of intoxicating liquor, in which condition to some extent there was some testimony showing the deceased to have been when the homicide occurred. He also introduced some testimony tending to show that he himself was a person of good reputation for the traits mentioned.

[1] The first point made by the defendant is that the court erred in allowing in evidence the alleged confession of the defendant to the sheriff; the claim being that it was extorted from the accused by illegal means, and was therefore involuntary. As has been shown, the sheriff brought the defendant into his office shortly after the arrest and questioned him about the shooting. Previously that officer had interviewed the other Indians under arrest upon the subject, and the sheriff said to the defendant that those Indians had told him that he (the defendant) fired the fatal shot, that he (the sheriff) already had sufficient evidence to convict the defendant, and that the latter ought to tell the truth. The sheriff denied making any threats or promises or saying to the defendant that it would be better for him to tell the truth or in any manner using undue pressure in forcing from him an admission of guilt. We cannot say that the confession was not a voluntary one.

[2, 3] The rule respecting extrajudicial confessions is well understood, and it is that evidence of such confessions is never admissible unless the prosecution shows, previously to its reception, that they were freely and voluntarily made and without any previous inducement or offer of leniency in punishment or by reason of any intimidation or threat (People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69, 67 Pac. 12); or, as the proposition is elsewhere expressed, a confession, to be admissible as proof against the accused, must not have been "extracted by any sort of threats or violence, nor obtained by any direct or implied promises, however slight, nor by the exertion of any improper influence" (3 Russell on Crimes [6th Ed.] 478).

[4] But, as is said in the case of the People v. Siemsen, 153 Cal. 387, 394, 95 Pac. 863, 866:

"Whether a confession is free and voluntary is a preliminary question addressed to the trial court and to be determined by it (People v. Miller, 135 Cal. 69 [67 Pac. 12]), and a considerable measure of discretion must be allowed that court in determining it."

See, also, Hopt v. Utah, 110 U. S. 574, 583, 4 Sup. Ct. 202, 28 L. Ed. 262.

In the case at bar there is an entire absence of evidence showing threats or promises, either direct or implied, or the exertion of any improper influence or the employment of any improper means to secure a statement from the accused. Indeed, the circumstances under which the confession was made in this case do not, in our judgment, go as far in impeachment of the confession as evidence against the accused as those under which a confession was obtained from the defendant in the case of the People v. Siemsen, supra. In that case the accused was told by the police officers, previously to his confession, that they had obtained a confession from one Dabner that the latter and Siemsen had committed the crime of murder, for which they were then under arrest and in the custody of the police. The confession of Dabner had been reduced to writing, and, in the presence of Dabner and certain police officers, was, before Siemsen confessed, read to him, and after it was so read Dabner remarked to the former, referring to his said confession, "Jack, you know it is true," and this was held to be a voluntary confession.

[5, 6] But it appears that after this confession of guilt to the sheriff the defendant was present at the inquest held by the coroner to inquire into and determine the cause of the death of Rich, and that he himself stated to the coroner and the jury that he had shot and killed the deceased. It was not shown that the accused was asked to testify at the inquest, nor was it shown that his statement before that tribunal was either the direct or indirect result of anything previously said to him by the sheriff. In any event, he was not, as a matter of law, compelled to testify at the inquest, and, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, it must be presumed that he voluntarily appeared before the coroner, and freely and without in any sense being coerced so to do admitted that it was he who fired the shot that killed the deceased. It follows that, even if the incriminatory statement made by the accused to the sheriff was, in truth, involuntary, the defendant, having himself voluntarily made the same statement before the coroner, cannot now claim that he was prejudiced by the ruling admitting evidence of his confession to the sheriff, assuming (but denying) that said ruling constituted error.

[7] The next objection to the record is based on an oral instruction given by the court to the jury. The instruction was given after the jury had retired for deliberation upon the case, and were, by their own request, brought into court for further information upon the law bearing upon extrajudicial admissions. The court then addressed the jury as follows:

"When the court admitted the evidence in it did so on the ground that, if it were true, why the confession was voluntary. If the evidence is true, the question for you to determine is whether or not you believe beyond any question that the evidence is true. The court decided that, if the evidence is true, the confession is voluntary. If you argue [agree?] upon what Mr. Byrnes [the sheriff] testified to, and then if you agree it is true, why the court decided that the confession is voluntary."

The foregoing language appears, on first blush, to be confusing and inconsistent in itself, and upon a mere casual reading of it there would be considerable difficulty in determining precisely what the judge by it intended to say. In one sentence the instruction appears to have told the jury that the confession was admitted because the court had found it to be true, which is, of course, not the correct view, for the instruction, so understood, would involve a plain trespass by the court upon the domain of fact. In another sentence the instruction stated that it was with the jury to determine whether the confession was or was not true, which statement obviously involves the correct view of the law. But a careful analysis of the language of the instruction has brought us to the conclusion that what the judge intended to say was that, when the court admitted the confession, it did so because the evidence disclosing the circumstances under which it was made was true, and thus the confession shown to have been voluntarily made, but that it was for the jury to determine whether the confession itself was made, and, if so, whether it involved the truth. The instruction, so interpreted, is legally unobjectionable. It can easily be understood, however, how the jury could, from the rather inapt phraseology of the instruction, have obtained the impression that a finding by the court that the confession was true was a necessary legal prerequisite to the admissibility of evidence of the confession, and the effect of such an impression would unquestionably be greatly to prejudice the substantial rights of the accused at the trial, and would, under ordinary circumstances, constitute a sufficient legal reason for a reversal of the case. But, assuming that the jury received from the instruction the impression suggested, still we think the cause should not be reversed therefor in view of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, which, we think, should, under the circumstances of the case, be applied here, and so rescue it from the fate to which it might be carried by said instruction but for that comparatively new amendment to our organic law.

The defendant was charged with the crime of murder, and the circumstances proved against him, independent of his confession, were, in our opinion, sufficient to support these findings by the jury had they so found: That the defendant and the deceased had a quarrel and used violent language toward each other in Rosie Judd's tent; that the defendant left said tent before any of the others present therein departed therefrom; that the defendant immediately went to his tent or camp, procured his rifle, and returned to within a short distance from the Judd tent and there waited for the appearance of the deceased; that, when the latter emerged from the tent into the darkness, the defendant fired at and inflicted upon the deceased a wound from the effect of which he died; that the defendant hastily fled from the scene of the shooting and returned to his own camp. These circumstances are borne out by the testimony of the witnesses, one of whom testified that Burns stood a few feet back of Bell and Switser when the shot was fired, and that he was heard to say, instantly before the shot was fired, "Come on, you s—n of a b—h," and by the further significant circumstance that his hat, which he was wearing when in the tent of Rosie Judd, was found after the shooting near the spot where lay the dead body of the deceased.

Thus the jury might have justly found the defendant guilty of murder of the first degree; or, to state the proposition differently, a verdict of conviction of murder of the first degree, predicated alone and independently of the confession upon the circumstances above detailed, would not be set aside on appeal on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to support such verdict, for from those circumstances the inference is well-nigh irresistible that the accused had made up his mind to destroy the life of the deceased before he left the Judd tent, that he went to his own camp to procure his rifle for that purpose, and that he returned and lay in wait for the deceased for the purpose of executing his previously conceived intent to slay him.

Under this view of the case, so well justified by the record, the defendant was fortunate, indeed, that his very able counsel were successful in saving him from the extreme penalty of the law, and under this view, having given the entire cause, including the evidence, a painstaking examination, we cannot justly conclude, even if the instruction had the effect of conveying to the jury the impression that the court was, before admitting evidence of the confession, required to and did decide that the confession was true, that the instruction so understood "has resulted in a miscarriage of justice." Section 4½, art. 6, Const., supra.

[8, 9] The next proposition upon which a claim of reversal is based grows out of an instruction which declared it to be the duty of the defendant to have avoided the killing of the deceased if he could have done so with perfect safety to himself or his person. It is said that such an instruction was condemned and constituted the ground upon which a reversal was ordered in the case of the People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 253, 259, 86 Pac. 187. The two instructions are not precisely alike, although, perhaps, it might with some reason be said that by the instruction complained of here the same doctrine was intended to be announced as was declared in the Maughs Case and which was held to be so far from the correct rule as to demand a reversal of that case. The instruction in that case, in effect, declared it to be the duty of one accused of slaying another and who relies upon the plea of self-defense to use, while under attack, all reasonable means within his power, consistent with his safety, "to avoid the danger and avert the necessity for the killing." In other words, the jury were thus told that it was the duty of the defendant, although under attack, to flee, rather than to take the life of his assailant, if he could do so consistently with his own safety or without injury to his own person. The instruction in this case says nothing about being under attack, but simply stated that if the defendant, with perfect safety to himself, could have avoided killing the deceased, it was his duty to have done so. However, even if it may be true that the distinction between the instructions is metaphysical, rather than substantial, and that the instruction in this case substantially states the identical doctrine declared in the instruction in the Maughs Case (which doctrine is not recognized by the criminal jurisprudence of this state), still it is quite manifest that the defendant here suffered no prejudice from it. The defendant himself, as seen, did not become a witness in his own behalf, and the pertinency of the instruction, if, indeed, it had any at all to the case, arose entirely by reason of the testimony of the witnesses that testified that the deceased, on leaving the inside of the Judd tent, seized a hop pole from the ground, and, with a threat, started toward the spot where Bell and Switzer were standing, and near and back of which one of the witnesses declared that he saw the defendant at the same time, although Bell and Switzer testified that, on account of the darkness of the night, they were unable to see him. Apart from this testimony, there was no ground for the theory that the defendant, in killing the deceased, was moved by the necessities of self-preservation. But, if the defendant was responsible for the death of the deceased (and, as shown, the circumstances clearly indicate that he did the killing), there is no element of self-defense in the case. The defendant, as seen, after quarreling with Rich, left the tent in which the quarrel occurred, procured his rifle, and unnecessarily returned to a point near the Judd tent, where he was, obviously, more likely to meet the deceased than if he had remained at his own camp, where, undoubtedly, he had gone from the Judd tent for the express purpose of securing the weapon with which the life of the deceased was destroyed. And at the time of the shooting there was no actual combat between the two men. In truth, accepting the circumstances of this case as true, the defendant, in the place of attempting to avoid further trouble with Rich after the cessation of their altercation in the Judd tent, needlessly and purposely put himself in the way of a renewal thereof, and thus it is plainly manifest that, as a matter of law, there was no ground upon which he could justly invoke the plea of self-defense.

We therefore conclude that, even though an instruction on self-defense might have been technically pertinent to the case (and it could have been only technically applicable, if at all), the alleged inaccuracy of the instruction here complained of in the statement of the rights of a person assaulted, when an attack is on, was innocuous under the circumstances of this case.

[10, 11] The next and last assignment is directed against instruction No. 16, whereby the jury were charged that the plea of self-defense is not available to a defendant who has sought a quarrel with a design to force a deadly issue, and thus by his own wrongful acts create a real or apparent necessity for killing his adversary. The instruction contains a correct abstract statement of the law, but it is claimed that there was no evidence presented or any issue of fact developed by the evidence to which it was applicable. But there is, as will be perceived from the statement of the facts herein presented, some evidence to which the instruction may be said to be pertinent. There was no error in giving the instruction, and certainly no prejudice inflicted upon the defendant by giving it, even if it was not strictly applicable.

There are no other points than those which we have already considered and disposed of, and, for the reasons herein stated, the judgment and the order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by John I. Stafford against Robert Rainey. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

B. K. Collier and John I. Stafford, both of Yreka, for appellant. Taylor & Tebbe, of Yreka, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover a commission for the sale of real property. The basis of plaintiff's claim is the following letter written to plaintiff by defendant:

"Seiad Valley, Calif. Feb. 27, 1914.

"Mr. J. I. Stafford, Dear Sir: I have got 316 acres of land about 125 acres in cultivation and about 80 more acres can be put in cultivation. Balance is rough and covered with timber there is a million or more of timber on the ranch good water right no debt. Price $9,500 will pay the customary five per cent for a buyer. Will give you Sixty days time.

"Robt Rainey."

In his brief plaintiff says:

"The only question in this case is, Did plaintiff find a purchaser within 60 days? If so, he is entitled to his commission."

It is admitted that defendant sold his ranch to one F. E. Stewart for $9,000 before the expiration of 60 days after February 27, 1914, and plaintiff claims that he found this purchaser and introduced him to Stewart and was instrumental in effecting the sale.

Upon the evidence adduced the court, sitting without a jury, made the following findings of fact and conclusions of law:

"(1) That defendant did not, on the 27th day of February, 1914, or at any other time, employ plaintiff as his agent to find a buyer for defendant's land known as the Rainey ranch, except to write a letter to plaintiff, giving plaintiff the right to sell said lands for the sum of $9,500, where in said letter defendant promises, in event of sale, to pay plaintiff a 5 per cent. commission.

"(2) That plaintiff never did produce or find a buyer for defendant's said land, and was not in any way instrumental in selling the same.

"(3) That said Rainey ranch, together with certain personal property, was sold by defendant himself, and by reason of an agreement the defendant had with one F. E. Stewart, such agreement being made before plaintiff had been given any authority to sell said Rainey ranch.

"(4) That plaintiff never did produce a purchaser, who was ready, or able, or willing, to purchase said Rainey ranch upon the terms given plaintiff to sell the same, nor did plaintiff furnish any purchaser whatever within the 60 days given him to find a purchaser, nor at any other time.

"As conclusions of law from the foregoing facts, the court holds that plaintiff is not entitled to any commission from defendant, nor has plaintiff been damaged in any sum or amount whatever by any acts of defendant."

Accordingly judgment passed for defendant.

[1] The essential feature of these findings, namely, that plaintiff did not "produce or find a buyer for defendant's said land and was not instrumental in selling the same," is challenged by plaintiff as unsupported by the evidence, and raises the single question of fact above stated by appellant.

Stewart, the purchaser, testified:

That he learned of the Rainey ranch, and that its owner would sell it through persons other than and not through plaintiff, and, on February 18, 1914, he wrote Rainey that he had been so informed, inviting reply, giving description of the property, price and terms of sale. Rainey replied on February 21st and, on February 26th, Stewart wrote him: "I will come down and look at your place. We will probably not get away from here [Yreka] for several days and will call you up when we start." He testified that plaintiff did not tell him he had the place for sale. "Q. Did Mr. Stafford have one single thing to do with bringing you together with Mr. Rainey in making the sale? A. No, sir; nothing in the world." It appeared that Stewart left Yreka to go to the Rainey ranch on February 27th. Before going he applied to plaintiff for a blank option, which was given him by plaintiff, and plaintiff volunteered to give him a letter of introduction to Rainey, whom Stewart had never met. On that day, or the day before, plaintiff telephoned Rainey, soliciting an answer to his former letter concerning the terms on which he would sell his ranch, and it was in response to this request that Rainey wrote the letter of February 27th, relied upon by plaintiff in the action.

Rainey testified:

That his correspondence with Stewart was before talking with plaintiff over the phone, and before he had received any letter from plaintiff stating that he had a possible purchaser. "Q. As I understand you, Mr. Stewart never was mentioned to you by Mr. Stafford over the phone? A. Never. Q. And you had no idea that the man he talked about sending down was the man whom you had written to? A. I didn't have any idea. Q. So you had no chance to tell Mr. Stafford that the man he was talking about was the very man you had written to yourself about the farm; you did not have any chance to do that? A. I didn't have any chance; no. Q. You didn't suspect that Stewart was the man Stafford was talking about? A. I did not."

Without stating the evidence further, we think there was sufficient to justify the findings of the court. There is some conflict between the testimony given by Stewart and Rainey and that given by plaintiff as a witness in his own behalf, but it was for the trial court to determine, in view of all the facts and circumstances shown, whether plaintiff had procured Stewart as a purchaser for defendant's ranch. Where there is sufficient substantial evidence supporting the findings, we have no concern with conflicting testimony of witnesses.

[2] Appellant claims error in overruling his objection to the letters written by Stewart and Rainey to each other, on the ground that they were hearsay and not binding on plaintiff, who had no knowledge of them. It was competent for defendant to show by this or other proper means that he had himself, unaided by plaintiff, procured the purchaser. In Crane v. McCormick, 92 Cal. 176, 28 Pac. 222, cited by appellant, the contract provided that the commission should be paid if the owner should withdraw the property from sale or effect a sale in any way during the year. This is not the case here. Plaintiff was not given the exclusive right to sell the land, and he does not base his claim on such right. He claims only that he procured Stewart as a purchaser. Failing to establish this claim, he failed to maintain his action, for he makes no pretense of having procured any other purchaser, or having tried to do so. No other alleged errors of law seem to call for notice.

PEOPLE v. WILLIAMS. (Cr. 572.)

1. HOMICIDE ⚡5—CAUSE OF DEATH—SECONDARY CAUSE.

Where death was attributed to the shock of the wound inflicted by defendant, and the shock of the operation necessary to remove the bullet, the wound was the primary cause, and the operation only an immaterial contributing factor, and evidence that deceased would have survived the shock of the wound is inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-10; Dec. Dig. ⚡5.]

2. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1170—HARMLESS ERROR—EXCLUDING EVIDENCE—CURE BY SUBSEQUENT ADMISSION.

Error in excluding a conversation between accused and his wife as to her relations with deceased and threats by deceased against accused was harmless where the witness subsequently related the entire conversation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145-3153; Dec. Dig. ⚡1170.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1036—APPEAL—PRESENTING QUESTIONS AT TRIAL—EXCEPTION TO CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Accused cannot complain of the admission of testimony by his wife on her cross-examination that she had been in the detention home where he made no objection to that question, though he did object to the subsequent question whether she was sent there by accused, and that question was immediately withdrawn.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1631-1640, 2639-2641; Dec. Dig. ⚡1036.]

4. WITNESSES ⚡268—CROSS-EXAMINATION—REPETITION OF DIRECT TESTIMONY.

Where the wife of accused had testified on direct examination that she had trouble with her husband, and had left his room on a certain date, a question on cross-examination calling for a repetition of that evidence was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 931-948, 959; Dec. Dig. ⚡268.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡695½ New, vol. 17 Key-No. Series—TRIAL—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—RULING ON OBJECTIONS.

Where defendant objected to a question asked his witness on cross-examination, and the court indicated that the objection was well taken, but did not rule directly thereon, and the district attorney resumed his cross-examination along other lines, defendant cannot complain, since the action was equivalent to a formal ruling.

6 CRIMINAL LAW 777—TRIAL—REQUESTED CHARGES.

In a prosecution for murder, a requested instruction that it is the duty of the jury to resolve the evidence on a theory or hypothesis consistent with the intentions of the defendant, is obviously erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1878-1882; Dec. Dig. 777.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW 829—TRIAL—REQUESTED INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION.

Defendant's requested instructions as to self-defense, and the right to act on communicated threats, were properly refused, where they were covered, in so far as correct, by the charge of the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank H. Dunne, Judge.

George Williams was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jos. A. Brown, F. D. Brown, and Frank J. Egan, all of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was charged with the crime of murder. Upon his trial he was convicted of murder in the second degree and sentenced to 20 years in the state prison. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

[1] The sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment is not challenged. It should be noted, however, that the evidence shows that a bullet, fired from a pistol in the hand of the defendant, entered the body of the deceased "right above the collar bone; * * * took a downward and inward course, penetrated the body of the third dorsal vertebra; * * * cut half the cord and embedded in the spinal canal." The immediate effect of the wound was partial paralysis of the body of the deceased, and an operation for the removal of the bullet was found necessary. The location of the wound, and the course and effect of the bullet, in all probability would have caused death even if septicemia had not set in. While the death of the deceased was attributed to two causes, viz., the shock of the wound and the shock of the operation, nevertheless the former was asserted to be the primary cause, and the latter is only an immaterial contributing factor. Under these circumstances it was immaterial to know, and therefore the trial court rightfully refused to permit the defendant to show, whether or not the deceased would have survived the shock of the wound in the absence of naturally resulting complications. People v. Lewis, 124 Cal. 551, 57 Pac. 470, 45 L. R. A. 783.

[2] The wife of the defendant was called and sworn as a witness in his behalf. Complaint is made of the ruling sustaining an objection to a question propounded to her which called for a conversation between her and the deceased, had shortly before the commission of the homicide. Conceding that the testimony sought to be elicited by the question was admissible, still the error, if any, in the ruling complained of was rendered harmless by the fact that the witness was subsequently permitted to narrate the conversation called for by the question objected to. The witness not only narrated the conversation, but she told in detail of the conduct of the deceased towards her, and of his threats to kill her husband, the defendant, in the event of the latter interfering with the illicit sexual intercourse which had been carried on between the witness and the deceased. All that the defendant desired to show in that behalf was ultimately established in evidence by the testimony of the witness notwithstanding that several objections to that line of testimony had been previously sustained. This being so, we are not seriously impressed with the complaint that the defendant was not permitted, in aid of his defense of self-defense, to show threats of the deceased, which it was claimed had been communicated to the defendant prior to the commission of the homicide.

[3] Upon cross-examination this witness was asked if she had been in the detention home. The question was answered without objection in the affirmative. In the absence of an objection the defendant will not now be heard to complain of the admission of this testimony. True, the question immediately following, "Were you in the detention home upon your husband's complaint * * *?" was objected to; but the latter question was withdrawn as soon as the objection was made, and as a matter of course the objection to the latter question cannot now be resorted to as a valid objection to the first question.

[4] Upon cross-examination of this witness an objection by the defendant to the question, "You had trouble with your husband on the 31st of August last * * * and left his room?" was overruled. There was no error in the ruling. The witness upon her examination in chief had testified that she had had trouble with her husband, the defendant, and had left his room on or about the 31st day of August. The question objected to did no more than call for the repetition in evidence of this fact, and in any event it was legitimate cross-examination.

[5] The trial court in effect sustained an objection to the question as to whether or not the witness had, with the knowledge of the defendant, associated with other men than the deceased. Without directly ruling upon the objection interposed, the court indicated that the objection was well taken, and without receiving an answer or pursuing the question further the district attorney continued his cross-examination along other lines. The result was equivalent to a formal ruling sustaining the objection, and therefore the defendant has no just cause for complaint in this particular.

[6] The defendant requested, and the court refused, to charge the jury that it was the duty of the jury "to resolve all of the evidence in this case upon a theory or hypothesis consistent with the intentions of the defendant. * * *" Obviously the requested instruction did not state the law, and therefore it was rightfully refused.

[7] There was no error in refusing the defendant's requested instruction relating to the law of self-defense, and the right of the defendant to act upon communicated threats. In so far as the requested instruction correctly stated the law, it was covered by the charge of the court.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

Charles Mack was convicted on a charge of assault with intent to commit murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

F. J. Murphy and Henry G. Tardy, both of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of the defendant upon a charge of assault with intent to commit murder and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The appellant having presented no request for the transcription of the evidence taken in the trial court, and no such transcription having been made or filed in this court, the case comes before us upon the judgment roll alone.

[1] The appellant relies upon certain alleged errors of the trial court in refusing to give certain requested instructions. As to some of these, an inspection of the entire body of instructions given by the court discloses that the substance of these rejected instructions is embodied in other instructions which the court gave, and in which the substantial rights of the defendant are as fully preserved as they would have been if his requested instructions had been given.

[2] As to certain other of the defendant's requested instructions, they embody references to the evidence, and, that not having been presented upon this appeal, we are unable to say whether there was any such evidence as would have entitled the defendant to have the instructions given. We find no error in this case upon the face of the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

The presumption created by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that every person in charge of any mine shall be held to be the agent of the owner, is rebuttable, and one working in a mine with knowledge that the owner will not be liable for his compensation is not entitled to a lien on the property on any theory of agency.

2. MINES AND MINERALS — 112 — LIENS FOR LABOR — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

The failure of an owner of mining property to file for record, as required by St. 1911, p. 1318, a notice disclaiming liability for work on the property, does not affect a workman having actual notice of the fact that the owner would not be liable for his compensation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by J. W. Street and another against Elizabeth M. Hazzard and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant named appeals. Reversed.

L. N. Peter, of Quincy, for appellant. M. C. Kerr, of Quincy, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. It was stipulated at the trial that all of the allegations of the complaint and all the affirmative allegations of appellant's answer were true. The facts thus agreed upon are as follows: The Bushman Mining Company is a California corporation. Appellant, Elizabeth M. Hazzard, is the owner or reputed owner of a certain mining claim described in the complaint, and, on the 7th of April, 1910, she entered into a certain agreement in writing with one Henry Adams by virtue of which he secured a working bond upon said premises with an option to purchase the same. On October 7, 1911, said Adams assigned said contract to the said Bushman Mining Company, and thereafter said company was the owner of said bond and option. Thereafter said company authorized said Adams to work and develop said mining claim. On or about December 9, 1911, said Adams employed plaintiff J. W. Street to work in and about said claim as an engineer, and agreed to pay him at the rate of $2.50 per day and board. That said plaintiff thereupon entered upon said work under said contract and continued till he had earned the sum of $116.25, of which only $10.80 was paid, leaving a balance due of $105.45 after deducting all just claims and offsets. On the 29th of February, 1912, said Street filed in the recorder's office a notice of lien in due form for said amount, together with $1.50 for the costs of verification and filing of the same.

On or about December 29, 1911, the other plaintiff, R. W. Goodhue, was employed by August Goebel as foreman for said Adams to work in and about said mining claim as a miner for the sum of $2.40 per day. Under said contract Goodhue earned $67.10, of which no part has ever been paid. On or about February 29, 1912, said Goodhue filed in the recorder's office of said Plumas county his notice of lien in due form for said amount of $67.10, together with $1.50 for the cost of verification and filing of said notice of lien.

On or about the * * * day of June, 1910, and within ten days after she had obtained knowledge of the work and labor in and about said mining claim as alleged in the complaint, defendant Elizabeth M. Hazzard gave notice that she would not be responsible for the same, by posting a notice in writing to that effect in a conspicuous place upon the said mining claim, which said notice ever since has remained and now remains posted in said place upon said mining claim. When each of said plaintiffs went to work and during all the time he was at work on said property he well knew of said notice and of the interest of said Adams and of said defendant mining corporation in said mining claim, and well knew that said Adams and said mining corporation were alone responsible for his claim for wages. Each of said plaintiffs performed said work at the instance and request and upon the sole credit of said Adams or said defendant corporation, and each of them well knew at the time he commenced said work that said Elizabeth M. Hazzard would not be responsible for his labor, and well knew that he must look to said Henry Adams or said defendant corporation alone for his wages during and at all times he was working.

[1] Upon the foregoing stipulated facts it seems clear that no judgment should have been rendered against appellant. Either of the two circumstances, first, that respondents had actual notice and knowledge that appellant would not be liable for their compensation, and, second, that they extended credit entirely and exclusively to said Adams and said mining company, is sufficient to destroy the foundation for any claim against appellant or her property.

If no notice had been given to respondents that appellant disclaimed liability for the work, the presumption would be indulged that the person in charge of the mining property was the agent of the owner, and, if nothing were shown to the contrary, this would be equivalent to an employment by said owner. Section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

"Every contractor, subcontractor, superintendent or other person having charge of any mining or work or labor performed in and about such mining claim or claims or real property worked as a mine, either as lessee or under a working bond or contract thereon shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter."

But this is a disputable presumption and may be rebutted and overcome.

"The presumption raised by section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in favor of one performing labor on a mining claim, that the person having charge of the mining was the agent of the owner, may be rebutted; and one doing such work, with knowledge that the person having charge of the mining did not own the property, and was not working the mine as the owner's representative is not entitled to a lien thereon on any theory of his employer's agency." Jurgenson v. Diller, 114 Cal. 491, 46 Pac. 610, 55 Am. St. Rep. 83.

[2] In the face of the stipulation as to actual notice and knowledge, it is of no consequence that said notice given by the owner was not filed in the county recorder's office. It seems that, when the notice was posted no such requirement was found in the law, but in 1911 (Stats. of 1911, p. 1318) the Legislature added the provision requiring the owner to "file for record a verified copy of said notice in the office of the county recorder of the said county in which said property or some part thereof is situated." The filing could have been of no possible advantage to respondents, since its purpose was entirely accomplished by the actual knowledge that they had of the facts as set forth in said stipulation. The recording of the notice is undoubtedly to convey to the persons performing the work knowledge of the nonliability of the owner. In the present instance, therefore, it would have added nothing to what was known and recognized without it.

[3] The other circumstance also that respondents knew of the interest in the property of said Adams and the mining corporation, and looked entirely to them for their wages, and gave no credit whatever to appellant, would seem to be totally inconsistent with any theory of appellant's liability. The case would be no stronger if respondents had expressly agreed to waive any claim of lien against the property or any cause of action against appellant, as their contract, in effect, amounts to the same thing.

"A party desiring to hold and enforce a lien upon the property of one who did not employ him must bring his case clearly within the terms of the statute. The lien is a creation of the statute, and the statute creating it must be looked to both for the right to such lien and the mode by which it may be enforced." Spinney v. Griffith, 98 Cal. 151, 32 Pac. 974.

"The appellant, in its answer, alleged that plaintiffs well knew the status of Pugh and his interest under the contract, and that with such knowledge they worked for Pugh, as principal and looked to him for their wages. This, if true, was a valid defense, and raised a material issue. Jurgenson v. Diller, 114 Cal. 492 [46 Pac. 610, 55 Am. St. Rep. 83]; Ayers v. Green Gold M. Co., 116 Cal. 335 [48 Pac. 221]; Reese v. Bald Mountain, etc. Min. Co., 133 Cal. 290 [65 Pac. 578]."

The transcript presents a rather peculiar situation, in that two separate judgments appear to have been rendered against appellant.

[4] The first is dated March 5, 1914, and recites:

"It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that plaintiffs J. W. Street and R. W. Goodhue have a lien for work and labor performed on the hereinafter described property, and said lien shall be against said property and improvements to the extent of any judgment that may be recovered in this action against defendants Bushman Mining Company, a corporation, and Henry Adams, as may be found due said plaintiffs from said defendants, together with all costs of suit in this action or to be hereafter recovered herein."

In the second judgment, rendered July 2, 1914, the amount found due the plaintiffs is recited, and it is directed that they "have a lien for said amounts and said costs on the hereinafter described property."

"There can be but one final judgment in an action, and that is one which in effect ends the suit in the court in which it is entered, and finally determines the rights of the parties in relation to the matter in controversy." Stockton, etc., Works v. Ins. Co., 98 Cal. 577, 33 Pac. 637.

It would seem that the judgment of March 5th was a final determination of the issues as to appellant, and the second judgment, having been rendered without the first having been set aside, is a mere nullity. In White v. White, 130 Cal. 599, 62 Pac. 1063, it is said:

"The judgment rendered was a final adjudication of the rights of the parties, and was conclusive not only as to the relief granted, but as to the relief denied or withheld. Code Civ. Proc. § 1908. Upon its entry the jurisdiction of the court over the subject-matter of the suit and the parties was exhausted, unless preserved in the mode authorized by statute. * * * After final judgment any further judgment, or order materially varying the judgment, is a mere nullity. Barry v. Superior Court, 91 Cal. 486 [27 Pac. 763]; Hubbard v. Moss, 65 Mo. 647; Ross v. Ross, 83 Mo. 100."

[5] The judgment entered March 5th, it may be suggested, is voidable for the reason, in addition to what has already been stated, that it lacks the essential element of the amount for which the lien is decreed. It is manifestly too uncertain in that respect to be enforced.

The appeal, it may be stated, is taken from each of said purported judgments and the order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. LEVEL. (Cr. 290.)

27 Cal. App. 257

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. April 26, 1915.)

1. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 254—MURDER IN SECOND DEGREE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence held sufficient to support finding of guilty of murder in the second degree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 533-538; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 254.]

2. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 215—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION.

The dying declaration of a deceased person, to be admissible in evidence, must relate to facts and not to mere matter of opinion.

3. HOMICIDE $\hookrightarrow$ 338—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—DYING DECLARATION.

Where the only conclusion to be drawn even from the evidence for accused was that the murdered man was not to blame in the quarrel, the admission of his dying declaration to that effect was not prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 709-713; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 338.]

4. HOMICIDE ⚡216—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION — FOUNDATION — BELIEF IN APPROACHING DEATH.

Where the deceased, whom defendant had shot fatally in the back, stated three times that he was dying, and proof thereof was made, proper foundation was laid for the introduction of his dying statement as the dying declaration of a deceased person.

5. HOMICIDE ⚡217—EVIDENCE—DYING DECLARATION.

Where proper foundation was made for the admission in evidence of a dying declaration by proof that the deceased had been aware of his approaching death, a question to the witness as to what conversation he had with the deceased after he said he was dying, was not improper as calling for statements made out of the presence of the defendant or as calling for an answer embodying the question asked of the deceased by the witness, being to that extent a self-serving declaration, so far as the prosecution was concerned.

6. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡1044—APPEAL—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—NECESSITY FOR OBJECTION BELOW.

In a prosecution for murder, where the question of a witness, to which objection was made, seeking to elicit deceased's dying declaration, was proper, but the answer was improper as stating such decedent's opinion as to whether he was to blame in the quarrel, no motion being made to strike out the answer or any portion of it, defendant could not complain on appeal of its admission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2672, 2674, 2675; Dec. Dig. ⚡1044.]

7. CRIMINAL LAW ⚡519 — CONFESSION OR STATEMENT—VOLUNTARY CHARACTER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for murder, evidence as to the voluntary character of a statement of defendant's to the district attorney held sufficient to warrant the ruling of the court admitting such statement.

8. WITNESSES ⚡330—TRIAL—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for murder, where defendant at the time of the shooting, made statements indicating that deceased's attentions to his wife were the cause of the quarrel, and where defendant's wife testified to acts of familiarity with her on the part of deceased, and that she was induced to leave her husband by the solicitations of deceased, for purposes of impeachment it was proper to cross-examine such wife as to the truth of contradictory statements she had made as to the familiarities and as bearing on whether she had told her husband at all, and also to assail her testimony that she had been induced to leave him by inquiries as to whether she had not declared that she left on account of his ill treatment of her.

Appeal from Superior Court, Shasta County; W. D. Tillotson, Judge.

John M. Level was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Braynard & Kimball and Oscar Geballe, all of Redding, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] Defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree, and the appeal is from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The evidence without conflict shows a deliberate, premeditated murder, and defendant was fortunate in escaping a verdict for the higher offense. The homicide occurred at the home of one J. K. Kelly, about three miles east of Redding, Shasta county. On the evening of August, 1, 1914, deceased and Mr. and Mrs. Kelly were engaged in conversation on the front porch of the Kelly home. The deceased sat in a small rocking chair at the southeast corner of said porch, and J. K. Kelly reclined on a roll of blankets at the northwest corner of the porch. Until a few minutes before the killing, Mrs. Kelly was in a hammock which was hung from the northeast to the southwest corner of the porch. About 9:30 o'clock p. m. appellant went to the Reid & Adams livery stable in Redding and asked for a rig to go to Clear Creek. He came, however, to the Kelly home, arriving about midnight, hitched his horse in front of the house, and approached the front porch through the front gate. Deceased was still sitting in said rocking chair and J. K. Kelly reclining on said roll of blankets. What then occurred may be stated in the language of Kelly:

"He was singing, 'Doodle, doodle, doodle, doodle,' as he oftentimes did about his common business. He came up, and he says, 'You are the man I am after.' Stepped his right foot onto the porch, and says, 'I will let you know that no God damned son of a bitch of a dago can step between me and my wife;' and he (Joseph Parenti, the deceased) sat pretty quiet, considering the fire, and at that time—about that time, he made something like such a motion as this (illustrating by arising from the witness chair and extending both arms out in front slightly spread apart) towards John M. Level. And he then drew right back and the firing commenced, and then he was on the run, really, and two shots were fired there, and he really was on the run at the time. It was all over instantaneous. Q. In what direction did the deceased, Joseph Parenti, reach out his hands, as you have illustrated? A. Well, right over the hammock towards John M. Level. Q. Did the deceased place his hands upon or reach the defendant, John M. Level? A. I don't think that he reached him. It was quite a distance across there, and that I couldn't positively say that he reached him or not, but, if he didn't he was close to him. Q. And after the deceased, Joseph Parenti, reached as you have illustrated, towards the defendant, John M. Level, what did he next do? A. The deceased? Q. Yes. A. He ran and disappeared through the front door, there, into the dining room."

It appears further that appellant crawled under the hammock and followed deceased; and, as he was pursuing, he said: "I will have you yet, you son of a bitch of a dago; I will kill you yet." Appellant stopped at the door of the front bedroom, pushed it open, knocking a lamp out of the hand of Mrs. Kelly, and saying, "Is the son of a bitch in here?" He then continued the chase through the house to the rear, and Mr. and Mrs. Kelly heard another shot fired. Appellant returned to the house and said to Mr. Kelly, "Come and see what I have done." Kelly went into the field and found Parenti about 270 feet from a side gate in the fence between the yard and said field. Parenti was on his hands and knees and was in a dying condition. He was shot in the back; the bullet having entered about three inches to the right of the spine and producing a wound necessarily fatal. There is not found in the record the shadow of justification or excuse for the homicide. Even defendant's explanation of the affair affords no substantial support to any valid claim of self-defense, and it was not even pretended that he was insane. In his statement made after his arrest to the district attorney he declares:

That he went to Kelly's to warn deceased not to interfere with appellant's family, and he found deceased sitting on the porch, and "I says, 'You are the man I want.' I says, 'I want to inform you not to come between me and my wife.' So I says, 'If you see her, don't speak to her.' I says, 'If you do I will follow you to the end of the world, or get you.' So he got indignant. He says he does as he God damned please to do. I says: 'Don't get excited; don't open your head or I will blow it off. You have interfered as far as I am going to bear.' He jumped up and got a chair and I shot at him. Mr. Chenoweth: How many times? Mr. Level: Three. Mr. Chenoweth: Three times on the front porch? Mr. Level: He went through the sitting room. I shot. So I run out the back. He was as far as from here to the street. I shot at him the third time. He went through the house, out the back door, out the side gate east of the house, just run south down the fence to the field. I followed him to the gate and fired at him. Mr. Chenoweth: Did you see him drop? Mr. Level: He staggered and fell on the—up on the fence. I walked up within 40 feet, and he was groaning. I turned and went to the house. Mr. Chenoweth: He was running when you shot the last time? Mr. Level: Yes, sir. Mr. Chenoweth: From you? Mr. Level: Yes, sir."

Comment on the foregoing is not called for. It may be said, however, that as to the chair he was contradicted by the testimony of Mr. and Mrs. Kelly; the latter stating that, when she went out on the porch immediately after the shooting, she noticed the condition and position of the rocking chair in which deceased had been sitting, and that the chair remained in its same position on the southeast corner of the porch with the cushion in the seat and deceased's hat was hanging on the back. From this, of course, the inference would follow that deceased had not picked up the chair or disturbed it, as claimed by appellant. But, according to his own statement, it is manifest that the episode of the chair furnished no justification for the subsequent pursuit and killing of deceased.

We have, therefore, a case of such clear and convincing proof of murder that it is impossible to conceive of an intelligent, fair-minded jury granting any greater favor to the defendant than finding him guilty of murder in the second degree. With the foregoing in view, we might with propriety dismiss the various assignments of error with the general observation that they should be disregarded as not affecting appellant prejudicially. Indeed, no case could be presented calling more persuasively for the application of the principle embodied in the recent amendment (section 4½, art. 6) to the Constitution. However, we may express our opinion somewhat sentimentiously as to these assignments of error.

[2, 3] The court gave this instruction:

"If you believe from the evidence that the deceased, after he was shot, made a statement as to who shot him, and under what circumstances the shot was fired, and that at the time he made such statement he believed he would die from the effects of said shot and entertained no hope of recovery, then you will give such statement, if proven, as much weight as if he were duly sworn, present, and testifying in the case."

The objection is that:

"This instruction was not applicable to the facts. Deceased did not speak of the circumstances under which the shot was fired. Deceased said he was not to blame. The instruction in effect directed the jury to give as much weight to the dying declaration of deceased that he was not to blame, if proven, as if deceased were duly sworn, present, and testifying in the case. If deceased had been duly sworn, present, and testifying in the case, he would not have been permitted to express the opinion that he was not to blame."

It is claimed, and justly so, that declarations of a deceased person, to be admissible in evidence, must relate to facts and not to mere matters of opinion. People v. Taylor, 59 Cal. 640. Appellant is right in his statement of the principle of law and in his contention that the instruction "was not applicable to the facts." But, as already has appeared, there was no room for any difference of opinion as to who was to blame for the homicide. The jury must necessarily have reached the conclusion that deceased was not to blame if they had not been so instructed or if said opinion had not been received in evidence. In other words, there was an irrelevant declaration of a principle of law that did not injure and could not possibly have injured appellant.

[4-6] As to the introduction of said opinion in evidence, we may mention the fact that Mr. Kelly testified that Mr. Parenti said as many as three times that he was dying. Considering this and the nature of his wound, there can be no doubt that the proper foundation was laid for the introduction of his dying statement. Then the record proceeds: "Mr. Chenoweth: Now, Mr. Kelly, after the remark or remarks were made by the deceased, Joseph Parenti, that he was dying, did you have any conversation with him with reference to the shooting? A. I did. Q. What was it?"

To this objection was made on the ground that no foundation had been laid; that it was made without the presence of the defendant; and that it embodied the question asked by the witness of the deceased and to that extent was a self-serving declaration, as far as the prosecution was concerned. It is clear that the objection was properly overruled, and the court did not err in allowing the witness to answer. The witness replied:

"I asked him if he had any feelings, anyway in the world that he was to blame for that matter, for that case of shooting. He says, 'Oh, no; no.'"

No motion was made to strike out the answer or any portion of it, and it is too late for appellant to complain of it. It presents the instance of an objectionable answer to an unobjectionable question, but appellant seems to have been satisfied to let it stand.

[7] The admissibility of said statement of appellant made to the district attorney is questioned on the ground that it was not shown to have been made freely and voluntarily. As to this we think, however, that the preliminary proof was sufficient to warrant the ruling of the court. The district attorney testified as to the interview:

"I simply introduced myself to the defendant, told him that I was the district attorney, and that I came to interview him if he desired to make a statement, and he started in immediately to tell me a version of the shooting, and after he had proceeded a short ways I had him stop, and went out into the sheriff's office, and whether Miss Scamman had come with me, or whether she had just arrived at that time, I called her in and had the statement taken down."

Miss Scamman, the stenographer, testified that she took down everything that was said, and we may remark that nothing appears therein to indicate in the slightest degree that the statement of defendant was other than entirely voluntary. There was no evidence of threats, promises, duress, or coercion, and it appears that the district attorney acted in the utmost good faith and was careful to take no undue advantage of defendant. It is suggested that the sheriff or jailer may have brought improper influence to bear upon the defendant to induce him to make the statement, but nothing of the kind appears, and the prosecution was not required to go further to show the voluntary character of the conversation. Of course, there was nothing to prevent the defendant from interrogating these officers as to the matter, but presumably he was satisfied to forego the privilege.

[8] There is some discussion as to the propriety of certain questions asked of Mrs. Level on cross-examination, but it is not apparent that any error was committed therein. On direct examination she had testified to acts of familiarity with her on the part of defendant, and it was surely permissible for the district attorney to interrogate her as to contradictory statements that she had previously made on the subject. It is the claim of appellant that the only purpose of the direct examination was to disclose the fact that she had complained to her husband about her treatment by deceased, thereby to account for the distraught condition of defendant's mind. The inquiry, however, extended to the truth of the statements that she claimed to have made to appellant, and to this it was manifestly proper to address the cross-examination. It would also be proper to test the truthfulness of the declared statements as affecting the probability of whether she had such communication with her husband at all.

Likewise, the witness having virtually testified that she was induced to leave her husband by the solicitations and importunities of deceased, it was open to the prosecution to assail the credit of this statement by inquiry as to whether she had not declared that she left on account of the ill treatment of her husband.

But, as already stated, no court would be justified in reversing the case, even if convinced that error was committed in each of the instances referred to.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. May 4, 1915.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐872 — JUDGMENT ROLL—UNCERTIFIED INTERMEDIATE ORDERS.

Where, on appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage, the clerk certified a record purporting to contain intermediate orders of the trial court, a paper writing, signed by the defendants, declaring and notifying the commissioners, appointed to make foreclosure sale, that the premises, by virtue of a homestead, were exempt from execution to a certain amount, and another paper writing, filed with the clerk subsequent to the entry of judgment, setting forth objections to the judgment and demanding that it be dismissed for such reasons, such intermediate orders and papers were not part of the judgment roll, and, as their integrity and purpose were not certified by the trial judge, could not be considered by the appellate court.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐671—APPEAL ON JUDGMENT ROLL.

Where the record on appeal did not set out, or purport to set out, the evidence, the appeal was simply on the judgment roll, and the court could consider only the papers and records constituting such roll.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇐907 — PRESUMPTIONS—EVIDENCE SUPPORTING FINDINGS.

Where the findings below sustained the judgment, in the absence of a record showing the evidence, it was to be presumed on appeal that the evidence supported the findings.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by John Dietz against John Scott and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. F. Rose, of San Francisco, for appellants. Perry & Dailey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment foreclosing a mortgage. The appeal purports to be taken under the new or alternative method prescribed by sections 953a et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, but the notice required by that section was not given to the clerk of the court below, requesting the preparation of such portions of the record as the defendants desired to use upon the appeal. The clerk, however, prepared and certified to a record which purports to contain the judgment roll, several intermediate orders made by the trial court, a paper writing signed by the defendants, declaring and notifying the commissioner appointed to make the foreclosure sale that the mortgaged premises were by virtue of a pre-existing homestead exempt from execution to the extent of $5,000, and another paper writing, filed with the clerk subsequent to the entry of the judgment, setting forth numerous objections to the judgment, and demanding that the judgment be dismissed for the reasons stated in the objections.

[1] The intermediate orders and the papers referred to are clearly no part of the judgment roll, and, as their integrity and purpose have not been certified to by the trial judge, cannot be considered here. Totten v. Barlow, 165 Cal. 378, 132 Pac. 749.

[2] The record before us does not set out nor purport to set out the evidence adduced at the trial; and, as was said in the case of Totten v. Barlow, supra:

"We have therefore simply an appeal upon the judgment roll, and can consider only the papers and records constituting such roll."

[3] Apparently the several points attempted to be made in the support of the appeal relate solely to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings and judgment made by the lower court. The findings of the court, however, sustain the judgment; and in the absence of a record showing the evidence it must be presumed that the evidence in turn supports the findings.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

TAXATION ⇐679—TAX SALE—PURCHASE BY STATE—RESALE—NOTICE.

Under Pol. Code, § 3897, providing that notice of the sale of land, purchased by the state at a tax sale, shall be given by publishing the notice for three successive weeks prior to the sale, and by mailing a copy to the party to whom the land was last assessed, the notice must be mailed to such person at least three weeks prior to the sale; otherwise the sale is void.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thos. C. Denny, Judge.

Action by J. T. Meddock and others against George Brown and others. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Ross Campbell, of Santa Rosa, for appellants. Philip Ware and A. B. Ware, both of Santa Rosa, and J. T. Coffman, of Healdsburg, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of nonsuit in an action to quiet title. The plaintiffs relied for their proof of title upon a tax collector's deed. The defendants objected to the admission of this deed in evidence upon the ground that it was void upon its face, for the reason that its recitals as to the notice of the sale of the property for taxes showed affirmatively that the required length of time of personal notice to the owners of the property prior to its sale was not given as required by section 3897 of the Political Code. The deed was conditionally admitted; but when the plaintiffs rested their case the defendants renewed their objection in the form of a motion for nonsuit, which motion having been granted by the court, the plaintiffs appeal.

Upon the motion for nonsuit the respondents relied successfully upon the case of Healton v. Morrison, 162 Cal. 668, 124 Pac. 240, as decisive of the question as to the invalidity of the plaintiff's deed. The trial court granted the motion upon the authority of that case. In so doing it committed no error, for no material distinction can be drawn between that case and the case at bar.

Upon the authority of Healton v. Morrison, supra, the judgment is affirmed.

DES GRANGES v. CRALL et al.

(Civ. 1745.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER — 85—COMPLAINT SETTING OUT DEFAMATORY WORDS.

A complaint in an action for libel, based on an alleged written notice sent by the defendants to a bank, the effect of which was pleaded as a notice in writing signed by them, in which they wrongfully, maliciously, and falsely charged that the plaintiff was insolvent, and that they were about to have him declared insolvent and a receiver appointed, was defective, for failure to set out the words of the notice.

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER — 80—WORDS ACTIONABLE.

A complaint, alleging defendants' notice to a fruit company, not to pay any moneys on account of the purported sale of oranges from certain land, pending their application for a receiver to protect their claimed rights in the land, notices to two corporations not to transfer certain shares of stock to the plaintiff, as he did not own them, but held them for the use and benefit of the defendants, stated no causes of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 184-186; Dec. Dig. — 80.]

3. LIBEL AND SLANDER — 86—COMPLAINT—"INUENDO."

The fact that the complaint pleaded an innuendo as indicating a hidden meaning to be drawn from the words did not aid causes of action, wherein the alleged libelous language was clear and plain, since an "innuendo" must not introduce new matter or enlarge the natural meaning of words, or put upon them a construction which they will not bear, and can never change the import of the words, or avail, unless the words to which it applies have a violent presumption of the innuendo.

4. JUDGMENT — 303—AMENDMENT.

Where the court entered an order sustaining the demurrer as to each of the alleged causes of action, which, through inadvertence of the clerk, was entered as an order sustaining the demurrer only as to certain of the causes of action, the court's order that the minutes be corrected to set out the intended ruling was within its right and duty.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Otto des Granges against Ada des Granges Crall and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edwin A. Meserve and Shirley E. Meserve, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Avery & French, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover damages from defendants because of the alleged publication of certain libelous statements affecting said plaintiff. A demurrer on both general and special grounds was interposed to the complaint, which demurrer was sustained by the court, and judgment followed, dismissing the action after plaintiff had failed to amend his pleading. The appeal is taken from that judgment.

Four causes of action were set out in the complaint, the first three of which were based upon certain notices alleged to have been sent to certain corporations. The first was a notice to a fruit company, directing them not to pay any moneys on account of the purported sale of oranges from certain land in Orange county pending an application by the defendants for a receiver to protect some claimed rights in the land upon which the oranges were grown. The second was a notice to a water company not to transfer certain shares of stock to the plaintiff, the notice stating that plaintiff was not the owner of the stock, but that he held the same for the use and benefit of the defendants. The third notice was one directed to a petroleum company, instructing that company not to make transfer of a certain number of shares of stock. In general substance this notice was the same as that set out in the one described last above.

[1] The fourth cause of action was based upon an alleged written notice sent by the defendants to a bank. The words in which this notice was framed are not set out, and the effect only of such words is pleaded, as follows:

"A notice in writing, signed by them, in and by which notice in writing they wrongfully, maliciously, and falsely charged that the plaintiff was insolvent, and that they were about to have him declared insolvent, and were about to have a receiver appointed of his business and affairs."

Allegations followed pleading an innuendo that it was intended by the notice to charge that the plaintiff was insolvent. As to this fourth cause of action, assuming that in the absence of a special demurrer plaintiff might be permitted to plead the libelous statements in the manner in which he did set them out, the specific point was here made that the words used were not made to appear in the pleading. The order sustaining the demurrer for that ground alone was the proper one to be entered. In the case of Haub v. Frier-muth, 1 Cal. App. 556, 82 Pac. 571, that being an action for libel where the court refers to the requirements to be observed by the plaintiff in pleading his cause of action, it is said:

"It is not sufficient to merely allege that he charged the plaintiff with having committed a certain designated crime. The words must be set out in the complaint that the defendant may have notice of the particular charge which he is required to answer."

[2] As to the other three alleged causes of action, an examination of the statements which it is charged were libelous does not disclose that they purport to be such upon their face, or that by any reasonable inference they could be so construed.

[3] The fact that the plaintiff pleaded an innuendo as indicating a hidden meaning to be drawn from the words does not aid these causes of action because the alleged libelous language set out is clear and plain.

"But an innuendo must not introduce new matter, or enlarge the natural meaning of words. It must not put upon them a construction which they will not bear. * * * Therefore, if the meaning of the language is plain, no innuendo is needed. The use of it can never change the import of the words, nor add to nor enlarge their sense. 'An innuendo helps nothing unless the words to which it applied have a violent presumption of the innuendo.'" Newell on Slander and Libel (2d Ed.) p. 619.

Unambiguous publication in words of common and ordinary import, containing no technical or provincial terms, is libelous per se or not libelous at all. Hearne v. De Young, 119 Cal. 670, 52 Pac. 150, 499.

[4] Appellant makes the point that he is entitled to a reversal for the further reason that the court first made an order sustaining the demurrer only as to certain of the causes of action and overruling it as to others, and later entered a corrected order sustaining the demurrer as to each of the alleged causes of action. The second order shows that the first entry was made by the clerk in the form in which it appeared through inadvertence, and this second order recited that the first ruling as entered was incorrect, and for that reason the minutes were ordered corrected to set forth the intended ruling of the court. We can see no error in this course being pursued; in fact, it was the duty of the court, if the clerk made an improper entry, to direct a correction thereof. In the judgment it is recited that the appellant was granted 16 days after the date of the corrected order in which to file an amended complaint, and that he failed to take advantage of this permission.

[5] It has been uniformly held, so often as to require no citation of authority to support it, that where the trial judge has sustained a demurrer upon certain specific grounds, that that ruling cannot be disturbed on appeal where it appears that any of the objections taken to the complaint, even though they be other than those deemed valid by the trial judge, are good.

In this case we think that as to the first, second, and third alleged causes of action the demurrer was properly sustained for want of sufficient facts stated, and as to the fourth alleged cause of action, conceding, though not deciding, that the pleading of that cause of action was sufficient as to general facts, that, upon the special demurrer of the defendants being made, plaintiff was required to set out the specific language which he alleged composed the libelous statement.

CLOUGH v. ALL PERSONS, ETC., et al.
(Civ. 1364.)

1. JURY $\Leftrightarrow$ 13—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

A defendant, in an action under the McEnerney Act (St. 1906, p. 78) to quiet title, who seeks relief under Civ. Code, § 3412, authorizing the cancellation of a written instrument, as to which there is a reasonable ground for apprehension that, if left outstanding, it may cause injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, seeks equitable relief, and is not entitled to a jury trial.

2. JURY $\Leftrightarrow$ 13—RIGHT TO TRIAL BY JURY—EQUITABLE RELIEF.

A defendant, who tenders the issue of fraud and undue influence in the procurement of deeds under which plaintiff claims, presents an equitable issue, and is not entitled to a jury trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 35-83; Dec. Dig. $\Leftrightarrow$ 13.]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Action by George A. Clough against All Persons, etc., and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Margaret Williams, administratrix of Thomas Fagan, deceased, appeals. Affirmed.

Albert L. Johnson and Ferno J. Schuhl, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Greg. S. McEvers and A. E. Bolton, both of San Francisco, for respondent Clough. Percy V. Long, of San Francisco, for respondent City and County of San Francisco. N. A. Elsner, of San Francisco, for respondent McCloskey.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to quiet title to land in the city and county of San Francisco under the so-called McEnerney Act. Plaintiff had judgment as prayed for in his complaint, from which defendant Williams, as administratrix, appealed. She also appealed from the order denying her motion for a new trial.

When the case was called for trial, defendant Williams (appellant here) requested that the cause be heard before a jury.

"The Court: I have read the pleadings, and I am of the opinion that the defendant is not entitled to a jury, and I therefore deny the demand for a jury trial and order that the trial proceed before the court."

Appellant says in her brief:

"The only point raised on this appeal is that of the refusal of the right to a jury trial."

It appears that:

"Plaintiff acquired the title under a trust deed set forth in full in the complaint, the recitals of which showed the grantors to be all the tenants in common, owners of the land, and the interest of each; that the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society held a first mortgage covering all the interests, and a second mortgage covering a part of the interests, also several other mortgages to other parties covering a part of the interests; that the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society had, under the power in its mortgage, advertised the property for sale, to pay the debt due to it; that all the tenants were desirous of a partition sale, payment of the mortgages, and division of the remainder. The trust deed provided that the trustee should go into possession (and it is alleged that he did), and instituted proceedings to have the title established under the McEnerney Act; and that he should lease the property to Chas. W. Lentz, from month to month until sold, at a fixed rental; that at any time prior to March 5, 1911, said Chas. W. Lentz should have the right to purchase at a fixed price, payable to the trustee, and, upon failure of said Lentz to purchase, then the trustee should sell the property; that from the moneys received by the trustee, after paying his expenses and fee, he was to pay off the first mortgage to the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, and the balance of the money should be paid as in the trust deed directed."

Prior to the execution of the trust deed, Fagan, appellant's intestate, made a deed to defendant Minnie Tucker of his sixteen-thirtieths interest. She signed the trust deed, as did Fagan, also, and the trust deed provided that the money coming from the Fagan interest should, after the bank was paid, be paid to Minnie Tucker. The only issue raised by Margaret Williams' answer is that the deeds made by Fagan to Minnie Tucker were "procured and accomplished" by fraud and undue influence of Minnie Tucker and her husband, and that the trust deed under which plaintiff claims was obtained under like influence. Williams did not deny the facts alleged by plaintiff and raised no issue on them.

Consistently with her answer, defendant Williams prayed the decree of the court establishing that at his death Fagan was the owner of sixteen-thirtieths interest in said property; that the instruments set out in the answer (from Fagan to Minnie Tucker and said trustee) be declared void and Fagan's interest at the time of his death be ascertained; and that Minnie Tucker held the interest described in said deeds in trust for Fagan.

[1] If appellant was seeking relief under section 3412 of the Civil Code, it "is clearly equitable," as was held in Angus v. Craven, 132 Cal. 691, 697, 64 Pac. 1091. But if she was not seeking relief under that section, as was said in Davis v. Judson, 159 Cal. 121, 127, 113 Pac. 147:

"Whether an action involves legal issues, or issues of equitable cognizance, must depend upon the facts alleged in the particular case; and, when the facts alleged here and the issues raised are considered, it is apparent that they are strictly of an equitable nature."

[2] It is not necessary to determine whether a proceeding brought under the McEnerney Act is an action in equity or at law, for no issue involved in the McEnerney portion of the proceeding was raised. The only issue tendered by Williams' answer was that of fraud and undue influence in the procurement of the deeds under which Minnie Tucker claimed an interest in the property. This issue was clearly of equitable cognizance. It follows that the court did not err in its ruling.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. FINLEY. (Cr. 534.)

1. HIGHWAYS $\hookrightarrow$ 186—OFFENSES INCIDENT TO TRAVEL—AUTOMOBILE COLLISION—FAILURE TO STOP—STATUTES.

Pen. Code, § 367c (as added by St. 1911, p. 62), provides that, whenever an automobile collides with any vehicle, the driver shall stop and render to the occupants all necessary assistance, including carrying to a physician or surgeon for treatment, if it be required or requested and shall give the number of the automobile, with the name and address of the driver and of the passengers, and imposes a penalty of imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $5,000 or both fine and imprisonment, for violation. Motor Vehicle Act, § 21 (St. 1913, p. 649), provides that in case of accident on a public highway, due to the operation thereon of any vehicle, the person operating it shall stop, and, on request of the person injured, shall give his name and address and the registration number of the vehicle, if it be a motor vehicle, and, if such person operating is not the owner thereof, his license number, if he is an operator or chauffeur, and the name and address of the owner, and that for violation is a misdemeanor punishable by fine not more than $250 and imprisonment not to exceed 30 days. Section 40 of the Motor Vehicle Act expressly repeals all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith. Held, that the defendant, who ran into one riding a motorcycle, injuring him, and proceeded on his way without stopping, could be convicted of a violation of, and sentenced under, Pen. Code, § 367c, to imprisonment for one year in the county jail, since the Motor Vehicle Act did not repeal statutes not inconsistent with it, and so did not affect the duty of a motorist under Pen. Code, § 367c, to stop and render assistance to one struck by him aside from the duty to stop and give name, address, and license number.

In a prosecution against an automobile driver for having collided with one on a motorcycle, and thereafter failed to stop to render assistance, an offense denounced by Pen. Code, § 367c, evidence held sufficient to show that defendant failed to render any assistance to the injured party.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 1032—APPEAL—INFORMATION — CHARGE OF FELONY AND MISDEMEANOR—FAILURE TO DEMUR.

In the absence of demurrer, where an information charged a felony, a violation of Pen. Code, § 367c, denouncing the offense of striking another while driving an automobile and failing to stop to render assistance, and also charged conduct constituting merely a misdemeanor, as violative of the Motor Vehicle Act, § 21, on appeal the defendant would not be heard to complain that the information charged both a misdemeanor and a felony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Waste, Judge.

W. A. Finley was convicted of the felony denounced by Pen. Code, § 367c, and he appeals. Affirmed.

P. M. Walsh, of Piedmont, and H. A. Gabriel, of San Jose, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant in this case was charged, in an information filed in the superior court of Alameda county, with the commission of the felony defined by section 367c of the Penal Code. The charging part of the information, in substantial accord with the language of the Code section referred to, alleged that an automobile, which was being driven by the defendant, collided with a motorcycle which was being ridden and driven by one Sumner Blacow, and that, although the defendant knew that his automobile had struck said Sumner Blacow and collided with a motorcycle upon which he was riding, the defendant "did then and there unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously fail and refuse to stop or cause to be stopped, either immediately or at all, said automobile, or to forthwith or at all render all necessary or any assistance to said Sumner Blacow * * * and carry said Sumner Blacow to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, and said W. A. Finley then and there refused to give or cause to be given to the said Sumner Blacow, the person struck by said automobile, * * * the number of said automobile, with the name and address of the driver, * * * or the name of the driver of said automobile. * * *

The evidence adduced at the trial, briefly stated, was to the effect that an automobile, driven by the defendant along a public highway in Alameda county, between the hours of 6 and 7 o'clock in the evening of the day charged in the information, collided with a motorcycle ridden by one Sumner Blacow. The latter, as the result of injuries sustained in the collision, was rendered unconscious, and died within a short time thereafter. Upon the happening of the collision, the defendant did not stop his automobile, but proceeded toward the city of San Jose, where he resided, without attempting to render assistance of any kind to Blacow. Just before reaching San Jose, the defendant's automobile came to a stop as the result of a breakdown, and while endeavoring to repair the machine the defendant was placed under arrest.

The defendant, as a witness in his own behalf, testified that, on account of the peculiar light and climatic condition which he claimed existed on the evening in question, he did not see the approach of the motorcycle, and in fact did not know that he had collided with it.

The defendant was found guilty as charged, and sentenced to imprisonment for one year in the county jail of the county of Alameda. The appeal is from the judgment and from the order denying a new trial. No demurrer was interposed to the information.

No fault is found with the rulings and the charge of the trial court, and the sufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment is conceded if it can be held that the trial court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the offense charged. That the trial court was without such jurisdiction is the only point made in support of the appeal.

[1] It is the contention of the defendant that he should not have been charged with and tried for any greater offense than that of the misdemeanor defined and denounced by the provisions of section 21 of the Motor Vehicle Act. Stats. 1913, p. 649.

The Motor Vehicle Act went into effect some five months subsequent to the time when section 367c of the Penal Code, under which the information was drawn, became law. The Code section in question reads as follows:

"Whenever an automobile, motorcycle, or other motor vehicle, or any vehicle whatsoever, regardless of the power by which the same may be propelled or drawn, strikes any person, or collides with any vehicle containing a person, the driver of, and all persons in, such automobile, motorcycle or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, who have or assume authority over such driver, shall immediately cause such automobile, motorcycle, or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, to stop, and shall render to the person struck, or to the occupants of the vehicle collided with, all necessary assistance including the carrying of such person or occupant to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, if such treatment be required, or if such carrying is requested by the person struck or the occupant of the vehicle struck; and such driver, and person having or assuming authority over such driver, shall further give to the occupants of such vehicle or person struck, the number of such automobile, motorcycle, or other motor vehicle, if the same have a number, together with the name and address of the driver of such automobile, motorcycle or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, also the name of the owner thereof and the name of the passengers; or passengers not exceeding five in such automobile, motorcycle, or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle at the time of such striking or collision. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years or in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding $5,000, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

The provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, in so far as they pertain to the point presented upon this appeal, are as follows:

"Sec. 21. In case of accident or injury to person or property on the public highways due to the operation thereon of any vehicle the person operating, driving or otherwise in control of the same shall stop, and upon request of the person injured or whose property has suffered injury, or any other person present, shall give such person his name and address and the registration number of his vehicle if it be a motor vehicle and if such person operating, driving or otherwise in control of such vehicle is not the owner thereof, his license number, if he is an operator or chauffeur, and the name and address of the owner of such vehicle."

Violation of this section of the Motor Vehicle Act is made a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment not to exceed $250 and 30 days. Stats. 1913, p. 652.

It will thus be seen that the provisions of section 367c of the Penal Code, and section 21 of the Motor Vehicle Act, are practically identical in so far as they denounce the failure of the driver of an automobile to stop in the event of a collision or in the case of accident or injury to person or property, and to give to the injured person or occupant of the vehicle struck his name and address and the number of his automobile. Section 40 of the Motor Vehicle Act in express terms repeals all other acts and parts of acts inconsistent therewith, and admittedly the provisions of section 367c of the Penal Code, denouncing as a felony the failure of a person driving an automobile to stop in the event of a collision, etc., and give his name, address, and the number of his automobile, are inconsistent with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, which declares that such or a similar failure shall be considered an offense only of the grade of a misdemeanor. If this be so, it may be conceded, as counsel for the defendant contend, that, if the defendant's offense had consisted only of his failure to stop and give his name, address, and the number of his automobile, he could not have been rightfully charged and convicted of any greater offense than that of a misdemeanor. But it will be noted that, while the information charges the failure of the defendant to stop and give his name and address and the number of his automobile, it also charges the defendant with a violation of those provisions of section 367c of the Penal Code which denounce as a felony the willful failure of the driver of an automobile colliding with another vehicle to render assistance to a person who may have been injured by the collision, and, if required, to carry such person to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment. The Motor Vehicle Act is silent upon the subject of rendering medical or other assistance to an injured person; and we do not find, and counsel for the defendant do not assert, that the provisions of section 367c of the Penal Code, in so far as they cover and control the duty of stopping and rendering assistance, medical or otherwise, in any wise conflicts with the purpose and provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act. The express purpose of the Motor Vehicle Act is to repeal only those acts and parts of acts which are inconsistent therewith; and, this being so, we are satisfied that the provisions of the Code section in question, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, must be considered as valid and subsisting law, the violation of which may be punished as in that section provided.

[2, 3] The evidence in the case, as previously narrated, was sufficient to sustain the charge of the information that the defendant failed to render any assistance or otherwise to the party injured by the collision, and the provisions of section 367c of the Penal Code denouncing such failure as a felony, not having been repealed or in any wise impaired by the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, it must be held that the information charged, and the evidence shows, the violation of the provisions of a valid and subsisting law, which, by the express provisions thereof, might be punished as a felony or as a misdemeanor in the discretion of the court. The fact that the information, in addition to the alleged felonious acts of the defendant, charged conduct which constituted nothing more than a misdemeanor, under the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act, was but a defect in pleading, which could and doubtless would have been corrected by the interposition of a demurrer. In the absence of a demurrer, however, the defendant will not now be heard to complain that the information charged both a misdemeanor and a felony.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

1. MECHANICS' LIENS $\hookrightarrow$ 132 — SUBCONTRACTORS — ENFORCEMENT OF LIEN — STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, as amended by St. 1911, p. 1316, authorizing a subcontractor to file for record his claim of lien within 30 days after completing his contract, or within 30 days after completion of the work by the original contractor, declaring that any trivial imperfection in the completion of the work shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of a lien, and permitting the owner within 10 days after completion to file a notice, an owner, taking possession of the building and accepting it as completed, may not deprive a subcontractor of his lien for materials subsequently furnished to complete the building, and the time within which the subcontractor may file his claim begins to run from the time when he ceased to furnish materials, notwithstanding the 10 days' notice, for the provision therefor does not change the rights of a materialman furnishing materials after the owner accepts the building as completed.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞ 1176—DISPOSITION OF CASE ON APPEAL.

Where the error is in the conclusions of law, drawn from findings sufficient to support a judgment in accordance with the complaint, the court on appeal will direct the entry of a proper judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4588-4596; Dec. Dig. ☞ 1176.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; Edgar T. Zook, Judge.

Action by Nicholas P. Yost and another, partners as the Mill Valley Lumber Company, against George F. Roux and others. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

H. C. Symonds, of Mill Valley, for appellants. Thomas E. Hayden, of San Francisco, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to enforce a materialman's lien. The record is here on the judgment roll alone. The court made findings from which as conclusions of law it found: That plaintiffs are entitled to judgment against defendants Barrick & Murphy, a copartnership composed of W. C. Barrick and H. B. Murphy, for the sum of $146.13, but without costs; that plaintiffs are not entitled to a lien against the property of defendants Roux and wife; and that these latter defendants are entitled to judgment against plaintiffs for their costs. Judgment passed accordingly, from which plaintiffs appeal.

The contention of appellants is that the trial court drew erroneous conclusions from the findings, and should have directed judgment enforcing the lien claimed as prayed for by plaintiffs. It appears from the findings of fact:

That defendants Roux and wife were the owners of the lots, situated in the town of Mill Valley, on which the building in question was being erected; defendants Barrick & Murphy were the contractors employed by the owners to erect the building; plaintiffs were materialmen, who furnished Barrick & Murphy materials for the building; that, about October 16, 1911, defendants Barrick & Murphy, having charge of the construction of said building, contracted with plaintiffs to furnish the lumber and other materials necessary for said purpose.

"(6) That acting under and in pursuance of said contract, and as ordered by said defendants Barrick & Murphy, plaintiffs herein, doing business under the firm name and style of Mill Valley Lumber Company, as aforesaid, furnished to said defendants Barrick & Murphy, between the 16th day of October, 1911, and the 4th day of April, 1912, lumber, lath, shingles, lime, cement, plaster, nails, and hardware, and other building materials to be used and which were actually used in erecting and constructing said building, and between the 4th day of April, 1912, and the 27th day of April, 1912, and the last thereof on said latter date, certain building materials as hereinafter set forth in paragraph 13 of these findings, the agreed price of all of which materials so furnished, and also the reasonable value thereof, when so ordered, and also when so furnished, was and is the sum of $1,676.51."

Of this amount, $1,530.38 was paid to plaintiffs, leaving due $146.13. It is then found that, on May 25, 1912, "and within 30 days after plaintiffs had ceased to furnish materials as aforesaid," plaintiffs filed their claim of lien in due form.

"(10) That the contract between defendants George F. Roux and May A. Roux, his wife, as owners, and defendants Barrick & Murphy, as contractors, under which the building described in the complaint was constructed, was completed on the 4th day of April, 1912, except as to trivial imperfections and modifications to correct them, which modifications were as follows: Adding about three feet to the height of the brick chimney, putting in cement steps entering into the basement, and making changes in window screens—and that on the 4th day of April, 1912, said defendants, George F. Roux and May A. Roux, his wife, as owners, went into the open, complete, exclusive, and actual use and occupation of said building."

Finding 13, mentioned in finding 6, supra, and referred to in finding 10, supra, is as follows:

"(13) That the only materials furnished by plaintiffs to defendants Barrick & Murphy, as contractors as aforesaid, from and after the 4th day of April, 1912, to and including the 27th day of April, 1912, were materials to be used, and were actually used, in making said modifications to correct said trivial imperfections in said buildings, and amounted in value to the sum of $10.34."

Finding 11 is that:

On April 9, 1912, "and within ten days after the completion of the contract last mentioned as aforesaid" (i. e., the contract between the owners and the contractors, Barrick & Murphy), the owners filed and caused to be recorded a notice setting forth that "said contract last mentioned was completed," which was in due form and duly verified.

Finding 12 is as follows:

"(12) That plaintiffs failed to file any claim of lien in the office of the county recorder of Marin county within 30 days after the completion of said last mentioned contract as aforesaid, or within 30 days after the completion of said building save for said modifications, or within 30 days after the filing for record of the notice of completion as above set forth."

[1] The rights of the parties are to be derived from section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1911. Stats. 1911, p. 1316. The section reads:

"Every original contractor, claiming the benefit of this chapter, within sixty days after the completion of his contract, and every person save the original contractor claiming the benefit of this chapter, within thirty days after he has ceased to labor or has ceased to furnish materials, or both; or at his option, within thirty days after the completion of the original contract, if any, under which he was employed, must file for record * * * a claim of lien containing," etc. (These requirements were complied with.) "Any trivial imperfection in the said work, or in the completion of any contract by any lien claimant, or in the construction of any building, improvement or structure, or of the alteration, addition to, or repair thereof, shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien."

Then follows what shall be deemed "equivalent to a completion for all the purposes of this chapter." The section then provides:

"The owner may within ten days after completion of any contract, or within forty days after cessation from labor thereon, file for record * * * a notice setting forth the date when the same was completed, or on which cessation from labor occurred, together with his name and the nature of his title, and a description of the property sufficient for identification, which notice shall be verified by himself or some other person on his behalf."

It is then provided that:

If such notice be not so filed the owner "shall be estopped in any proceeding for the foreclosure of any lien * * * based on the ground that said lien was not filed within the time provided in this chapter."

Briefly stated, the court found that plaintiffs continued to furnish materials as ordered and which were used in the building up to April 27, 1912, and they filed their lien within thirty days thereafter. The court found that the building was completed, except as to the trivial imperfections mentioned, on April 4, 1912, and that the owners filed their notice within 10 days thereafter. The contention of respondents is that the time in which plaintiffs' rights to file their lien began to run from the completion of the building, April 4th, while appellants' contention is that they had 30 days from the time they ceased to furnish materials. The question is to be determined by the statute as it was amended in 1911, and not as it stood prior thereto. The old statute (section 1187, Code Civil Proc.) provides that:

"Every person other than the original contractor furnishing materials" was required to file his lien "at any time after the completion of any building, * * * and until the expiration of thirty days after the filing of said notice of completion or cessation by said owner," mentioned in the early part of the section.

It will be observed that the materialman was given 30 days after the completion of the building, under the former section, and also "until the expiration of thirty days after" the owner had filed said notice. The section has been amended so that now the materialman may file his claim of lien within 30 days after he has—

"ceased to * * * furnish materials, or at his option [if this clause refers to him] within thirty days after the completion of the original contract, if any, under which he was employed."

Findings 6 and 13 were that plaintiffs furnished building materials between October 16, 1911, and April 4, 1912, and between April 4th and April 27th, certain building materials, all of which were used in the building, amounting to $1,676.51, of which plaintiffs had received $1,530.38 and no more, leaving due $146.13.

It seems clear to us that plaintiffs had 30 days after they had "ceased to furnish materials" within which to file their claim of lien, and in fact filed it in time, unless they lost this right because the owner took possession of the building and accepted it as completed. The court found that the building was completed, except as to certain modifications which required materials of the value of $10.34, and which the court found were "trivial imperfections." Still, these materials were used in the building, and it was not complete in fact, though so treated by the owners, until those materials were so used. Whether trivial or not, the fact remained and was found by the court that plaintiffs did not cease to deliver materials, which were used in the building, until April 27th. We do not think the owner could cut off plaintiffs' right given by the statute by occupying the building while plaintiffs were still furnishing materials for it and which were being used in it. It is true that the statute provides that the occupation by the owner shall be deemed equivalent to a completion "for all the purposes of this chapter." But the time within which plaintiffs had the right to file their claim of lien did not begin to run from the completion of the building, but from the time when they "ceased to furnish materials." As to the original contractor, the time begins to run upon the "completion of his contract," and as to him the occupation of the building might "be deemed equivalent to a completion," for such is the language of the statute. The 10 days' notice which the owner may give is to be given "after completion of any contract," and, in our opinion, does not change the rights of a materialman who may be called upon to furnish materials used in the building after the owner accepts it as completed. It generally happens that materials are delivered and used in a building, and labor is bestowed upon it in course of its construction, long before it is completed. The amendment of the statute seems to have given the materialman and the one who bestows labor the option either to file his claim with reference to the time he ceases to furnish materials or labor, or to wait and take his chances of knowing just when the building is deemed completed, a fact always within the knowledge of the owner and original contractor, but not so of the materialman and laborer. We fail to see any purpose in the change in the statute unless this be true, and it is fair to assume that the Legislature had some purpose in making the amendment.

[2] Inasmuch as the error complained of lies in the conclusions of law drawn from the findings, and inasmuch as the findings are sufficient to support a judgment in accordance with the complaint, we see no reason for a new trial to be had. It is therefore ordered that the judgment be reversed, and the trial court directed to enter judgment for plaintiffs as prayed for.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by A. M. Robertson against H. C. Finkler and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Albert Mansfield, of Redwood City, for appellant. Ross & Ross, of Redwood City, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff seeks the judgment of the court that he is the owner of one-sixth of the waters of a certain spring, known as Rock spring, and restraining defendants from diverting more than two-thirds of the waters of said spring; also directing defendants to remove any obstruction maintained by them which prevents plaintiff from obtaining the use of said one-sixth of said waters; also for damages in the sum of $2,500. The findings of fact and conclusion of law were that plaintiff is the owner of an undivided one-sixth interest in said spring and the waters thereof, and that defendants are the owners of four-sixths, the remaining one-sixth belonging to O. F. Westphal; that defendants have not nor has either of them diverted any part of the waters of said Rock spring to which plaintiff is entitled, nor have defendants or either of them interfered in any way with plaintiff's free and unobstructed use of said waters to which plaintiff is entitled nor threatened so to do; that plaintiff has not been damaged "in any way or manner whatsoever by reason of any alleged diversion or obstruction of the said Rock spring by said defendants, or either of them, or by any act or acts of defendants or either of them, whatsoever." Judgment passed for defendants, from which plaintiff appeals under the alternative method.

As respects the question of alleged damages, there was no evidence supporting plaintiff's averments, and plaintiff makes no claim for damages in his brief. That feature of the case may therefore be dismissed from consideration.

Plaintiff states in his brief:

"This matter is one of fact rather than one of law. * * * I do not believe that there is any law entangled in his case. From the testimony and under the admission of the pleadings we are absolutely entitled to one-sixth of 'Rock spring,' wherever that may be, and to one-sixth of the waters flowing therefrom, and, whether or not Dr. Taylor or Mr. Finkler made any developments of 'Rock spring,' we nevertheless would be entitled to our one-sixth of all the waters flowing therefrom."

No question arises as to plaintiff's right to "one-sixth of Rock spring, wherever that may be, and to one-sixth of the waters flowing therefrom," for the evidence so showed, and the court so found. The only question in dispute is whether certain water developed by defendants and their predecessors in estate is part of or should have been found by the court to be part of the Rock spring water.

The land on which Rock spring and the developed water were situated is part of a tract of 600 acres formerly belonging to Jacob Kreiss, and is situated in the foothills near Redwood City, San Mateo county. After his death, in 1901, the Kreiss ranch was subdivided. Lot 5 of this subdivision was deeded to Mrs. Hattie Kreiss-Greene, a daughter, subject to the right appurtenant to the parcel of land marked "Isaac," situated on said lot 5, for an undivided one-third interest in a certain spring known as Rock spring, with the right to draw the waters thereof and therefrom, over and across said lot 5. Subsequently, the portion of the ranch marked "Isaac" was conveyed by the heirs of Jacob Kreiss to one John Isaac, the deed containing a similar recital to that above referred to in the Greene deed in reference to Rock spring, and conveying one-third interest in said Rock spring. Similarly, another portion of the ranch was sold by said heirs to one Ernest Marchand, conveying one-third interest in said Rock spring, and another portion to Harry R. Fee, who conveyed a one-sixth interest in Rock spring to plaintiff, who through mesne conveyances became owner, in 1907, of 15 acres of said land and the said one-sixth of Rock spring. Before plaintiff had obtained title Marchand conveyed his said land with his right to the spring to John Isaac, who thus became owner of two-thirds of the spring. Subsequently, Isaac's land and water right in the spring passed to Dr. A. Miles Taylor, and he sold to defendants. In December, 1908, Mrs. Greene having died, the remaining portion of lot 5, 67.73 acres, upon which Rock spring is located, was sold at probate sale for $4,450, plaintiff and defendants being competitive bidders, and defendants became the purchasers, thus becoming the owners of the upper part of the tract, lot 5, which the evidence showed was valuable only as water-bearing land. We find, then, that when this action was commenced plaintiff owned 15 acres of lot 5 and one-sixth interest in the waters of Rock spring, and defendants owned the fee of the upper portion, 67.73 acres, of lot 5 upon which the spring is located, and they also owned the Isaac and Marchand tracts and two-thirds of the waters of said spring.

[1, 2] It appears that a gulch runs through lot 5 with what are referred to as left-hand and right-hand branches. Above the junction of these branches and on the left-hand branch is Rock spring, and on the right-hand branch a spring called Cow spring.

While Dr. Taylor owned the Marchand and Isaac tracts he, with permission of the owners of the land, constructed a cement tank or receptacle for water at the junction of said two branches of said gulch, about 10 feet square and $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet in depth, for the purpose of a water reservoir. The so-called "Isaac pipe line," mentioned in the complaint and in the testimony, was connected with this tank and conveyed all the water stored therein to the Taylor—now defendants'—residence. By permission of the owner of the land, Taylor carried the water of "Cow spring" by pipe to this tank. No water from said Cow creek flowed or flows into or reaches Rock spring. One fact in controversy is the location of this latter spring with reference to said tank. The court found that:

It is "located at the base of a large rock situate in the left-hand ravine mentioned in finding 3 and about 40 feet distant above the Taylor tank or receptacle, and that the flow of water from said spring is sometimes barely perceptible, and does not exceed an average of more than 500 gallons per day."

The witnesses did not agree as to the distance apart of the spring and tank, but there was ample evidence supporting the finding on this fact. As to the quantity of water afforded by the spring, one witness who was familiar with its history testified that at times all its water could have been conveyed through "a wheat straw" and none of the witnesses placed its average flow in ordinary seasons at more than 500 gallons. Unless the water first developed by Taylor is part of Rock spring water, we do not see that the quantity of water in that spring is very material, for whatever it is the respective rights of the parties to it are not questioned. The court found:

"That at no time since the construction of said cement tank or receptacle by said A. Miles Taylor did all or any of the water of said Rock spring flow into said 'Isaac pipe line,' nor did the defendants, or either of them, divert or take any or use any part of said water."

The evidence is conflicting as to the point where the excavations were made in the sides of the ravine to develop water. There was testimony that it was from 150 to 200 feet above Rock spring. Witness Woodward drove the tunnels for Dr. Taylor. He testified that he ran two tunnels and found water at a distance of about 15 feet in the hill; that he ran through formations impervious to water, indicating that the water developed did not and would not otherwise have found its way into the ravine; and that he piped the water 200 feet down the ravine to the cement tank which he built to receive it. It has already been stated that the "Isaac pipe line" connected this tank with Taylor's (now defendants') residence. Witness Bromfield, city engineer of the city of San Mateo and county surveyor of San Mateo county, who claimed to have had experience as a mineralogist, surveyed and subdivided this tract of land and visited the two water developing tunnels above referred to. He testified that:

One of the tunnels was 195 feet "from what I understand is shown to be Rock spring," and "the other is 215 feet. Q. As an expert, would you say that any of this water which has been reached by going through this rock some 16 feet, would any of the water there feed the spring which was pointed out to you by Jacob Kreiss? A. I do not think it did."

Witness Finkler, one of defendants, testified that he has to continue work in the tunnels to keep up the flow "on account of the clay that comes in there and fills up these cracks and lessens the flow." It was shown that this cement tank stood up above the bottom of the gulch so that, except when the weather was stormy, the water of the gulch coming from the Rock spring ran around it.

"Every storm, of course, it would flow over. Q. But a small stream would flow around it? A. It goes around it. There was a certain amount of flow there."

A short distance below this tank was what was called the Fee dam, from which plaintiff received by pipe his share of the water, and he testified that he received a sufficient supply up to 1909 or 1910, which was two years or more after the tunnels were dug. The evidence justified the finding that in developing water, as was shown, some 200 feet above Rock spring, it did not affect the flow at that spring. There was evidence tending to controvert this fact, and evidence also conflicting in some degree with other facts in the case, but there was some substantial evidence supporting the findings, and, under the familiar rule, we must resolve every substantial conflict in the testimony in favor of the findings. *Bancroft-Whitney Company v. Action by O. F. Westphal against H. C.

Finkler and wife. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and Wm. Hoff Cook, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Ross & Ross, of San Mateo, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. By stipulation this case was heard and decided in the lower court upon the evidence submitted in Robertson v. Finkler, 149 Pac. 784. The questions involved in Robertson v. Finkler, No. 1334, this day decided, are identical with the questions raised in this case, and our decision in that case is determinative of this case. Westphal's interest in Rock spring was one-sixth, and is not disputed. He claimed, however, as did Robertson, that the water developed above the spring was part of the water of the spring. He failed, as did Robertson, in establishing his contention.

Upon the authority of the decision in Robertson v. Finkler, No. 1334, the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SENEGRAM. (Cr. 341.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. April 30, 1915.)

1. PERJURY — ELEMENTS—MATERIALITY.

In perjury, the matter sworn to need not be directly and immediately material, it being sufficient if so connected with the fact in issue as to have a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove such fact by giving weight or probability to the testimony of a witness testifying thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-54; Dec. Dig. —11.]

2. PERJURY — ELEMENTS—MATERIALITY.

In a prosecution for receiving stolen goods, a witness gave testimony, tending to fix the crime upon the accused, and to show that the testifying witness had no part in making the purchase of the goods alleged to have been stolen, accused claiming that he bought such goods on the direct orders from the witness, who was his employer. Subsequently an indictment for perjury was brought against such testifying witness. Held, that the evidence given by such witness was material upon one of the chief points raised in the former prosecution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perjury, Cent. Dig. §§ 38-54; Dec. Dig. —11.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS — CURING ERROR.

In a prosecution for perjury, an instruction that "an unqualified statement of that which one does not know to be true is equivalent to a statement of that which one knows to be false," when taken in connection with an instruction defining perjury and stating that any person who, having taken an oath to testify truly, willfully states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury, was not prejudicial to defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1992-1995, 3158; Dec. Dig. —823.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW — INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for perjury, an instruction submitting to the jury the question whether any testimony given by defendant was material, while erroneous, was not prejudicial, where the court also instructed that all the testimony alleged to be false was given upon material matters.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1992-1995, 3158; Dec. Dig. —823.]

5. CRIMINAL LAW — 1169 — APPEAL — EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

In a prosecution for perjury, the admission of a resolution by a board of directors, showing that defendant as president of the corporation had feloniously taken money therefrom and used his office for the purpose of ruining the company, was prejudicial error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 754, 3088, 3130, 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. —1169.]

6. CRIMINAL LAW — 1170½ — APPEAL — PREJUDICIAL ERROR—LIMITING IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

Since the state of mind of a witness, his interest, or bias, are always proper matters for inquiry where the testimony upon which a prosecution is based depends for their falsity upon the testimony of the prosecuting witness, any effort to abridge defendant's right to impeach such witness is prejudicial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Philip Senegram was convicted of perjury, and from the judgment and order denying a new trial, he appeals. Reversed.

Earl Rogers, W. H. Dehm, H. L. Giesler, and Baird & Gerecht, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Dept. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of perjury, and appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It appears that one S. Bauman was an employé of the Senegram Company, a corporation, of which defendant was president. Some one telephoned the company, expressing a desire to sell a lot of copper wire and designated a certain saloon in Los Angeles as the place where negotiations could be conducted for its purchase. Bauman met the party and purchased the wire, which as a matter of fact had been stolen from some point in Arizona. Thereafter a complaint was filed, charging Bauman with receiving stolen goods. At the preliminary hearing had thereon before a magistrate, defendant was called as a witness and, as alleged in the indictment, gave certain false and material testimony the tendency of which was to fix the crime upon Bauman and show that defendant had no part in making the purchase of the wire, whereas Bauman claimed that the telephone communication was had with Senegram, who directed the former, as such employé, to go to the place designated and make an offer of 13 cents per pound for the wire. This testimony, covering some five or six pages of the transcript as set forth in the indictment, consisted of answers made by defendant to questions propounded, each and all of which are alleged to have been material and knowingly and willfully falsely made.

[1, 2] That defendant gave such answers under oath in the case of People v. Bauman was clearly proved by the official stenographer who reported the case, and there was sufficient evidence adduced to justify the jury in finding that the major part thereof was false. The tendency of the evidence given by this defendant before the magistrate was to prove that Bauman, unknown to defendant and of his own motion, purchased the copper knowing it to have been stolen; that defendant was at the time out of the city, and did not receive a communication by phone pursuant to which he instructed Bauman to meet the party and, on behalf of the Sene-gram Company, buy the wire for 13 cents per pound.

"The matter sworn to need not be directly and immediately material. It is sufficient if it be so connected with the fact directly in issue as to have a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove such fact by giving weight or probability to the testimony of a witness testifying thereto, or otherwise." 22 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, p. 687.

Measured by this rule, we entertain no doubt as to the materiality of the evidence given by defendant upon one, if not the chief, issue raised in the Bauman Case. See, also, People v. Barry, 63 Cal. 63; People v. Metzler, 21 Cal. App. 82, 130 Pac. 1192.

[3] Appellant insists that the court committed prejudicial error in giving certain instructions to the jury. These instructions, which we will designate as 1 and 2, are as follows:

"(1) An unqualified statement of that which one does not know to be true is equivalent to a statement of that which one knows to be false.

"(2) The court further instructs the jury that it is not necessary to prove or establish all of the matters alleged and set up in the information as constituting the charge of perjury against the defendant herein. It is sufficient if you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the prosecution has proven that any of the matters charged in the information were so sworn to or testified to by the defendant on the occasion of his testifying as a witness as charged in the information, and that the same is proven by the prosecution, beyond a reasonable doubt, to have been false and untrue at the time the same was so sworn to, or testified to, to the then knowledge of the defendant, as charged in the information, and that the same was material."

Instruction No. 1, embodying the provision of section 125 of the Penal Code, must be read in connection with another instruction given by the court in the language of section 118, Penal Code, and, so considered, even conceding that it was inapplicable to the issue raised by the facts pleaded, nevertheless could not have been prejudicial to defendant. People v. Von Tiedeman, 120 Cal. 128, 52 Pac. 155.

[4] The other instruction, No. 2, is attacked upon several grounds. Appellant insists that it is erroneous by reason of the fact that the court submitted to the jury the determination of the question as to whether or not any testimony given by defendant was material. The court erred in so directing the jury. "The question of the materiality of evidence, no matter when or how it may arise, is always one of law for the court, and not of fact for the jury." People v. Lem You, 97 Cal. 224, 32 Pac. 11. Nevertheless, defendant could not have been prejudiced by such erroneous instruction for the reason that elsewhere the court, by an instruction which we will designate No. 3, properly instructed the jury that all of—"the said testimony * * * was a material matter and was material evidence and testimony in the said preliminary examination and proceeding."

Hence, since by No. 3 the court declared all of the charges of false testimony averred in the indictment to be material, the instruction No. 2, under which the jury might have found some of the testimony which they believed to have been falsely given immaterial, must be deemed favorable rather than prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant. People v. Lem You, supra. It is likewise obvious that, conceding the two instructions respecting the question of materiality of the evidence to be inconsistent, such fact could in no wise have been prejudicial to defendant.

Appellant insists that instruction No. 2 is also erroneous in that it instructs the jury that it was not necessary to a conviction that they find all of the testimony alleged in the indictment to have been given by defendant false, but that if any of the matters and things so sworn to were proven false, such fact would justify them in finding defendant guilty of the charge of perjury. The alleged error in the instruction is based upon the contention that the offense is assigned upon all of the testimony given, instead of predicating the charge upon a particular answer. In volume 30, page 1452, Cyc., the rule is stated thus:

"If, however, the indictment is in one assignment, failure to prove all the statements substantially as alleged is fatal to the prosecution."

To the same effect is Brown v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 50, 48 S. W. 170, where it is said:

"But here the assignment is in solido, and contains in combination several statements, all of which together are alleged to be material, and the falsity of all is charged. We cannot discover these allegations, but must consider all together, and that together they present a material issue, and as alleged it was incumbent on the state to prove * * * that appellant swore to all the statements substantially as alleged."

The indictment sets forth upwards of 30 answers to as many questions propounded to defendant in the Bauman Case, "each and all and every of them so made * * * and sworn to as true" are alleged to have been material, as well as false. Since the allegation is that each and every one of the answers so given was false, it cannot be said that the charge was based upon the falsity of the evidence in solido set forth in the indictment. On the contrary, while the form of pleading may be objectionable, nevertheless, in the absence of a special demurrer, the indictment, since it alleges that each and every one of the answers was false, must be deemed sufficient as a separate and distinct assignment of perjury based upon each answer sworn to by defendant. If this be true, it necessarily follows that the court committed no error by instructing the jury that if they found any of the matters or testimony set forth in the indictment to be false, such fact was sufficient to justify them in bringing in a verdict of guilty.

[5] As stated, defendant was president of the Philip Senegram Company, a corporation. It appears that some time prior to his trial the board of directors of the corporation passed a resolution as follows:

"Whereas, it appears that Philip Senegram, president of this company, has feloniously taken moneys therefrom and has neglected the duties of his office and used his office for the purpose of ruining this company, now, therefore, be it resolved that the said Philip Senegram be and he is hereby removed as president of this company and as an employé thereof."

This resolution was admitted into evidence over the objection of defendant. The Attorney General does not seek to justify the ruling, but, conceding the error, insists that the prejudicial effect thereof, if any, was cured by the fact that defendant introduced the findings of a court in a civil action brought by the corporation against Senegram to recover moneys alleged to have been taken by him from the company, which findings and judgment exonerated defendant from such charge. That the admission of the resolution in evidence was gross error must be conceded. It had no possible bearing upon the issue involved in the trial. Whether or not defendant had wrongfully appropriated money from the corporation of which he was president and otherwise ruined the company, did not tend, in any degree, to show whether or not he had sworn falsely in the Bauman Case. By admitting in evidence the accusation thus formally made by defendant's business associates the court in effect told the jury that the making of such charge was a material matter for their consideration in determining the question of defendant's guilt, as charged in the indictment. The effect of such consideration, since the matter was well calculated to blacken his character, must necessarily have been highly prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant.

Appellant complains of several rulings of the court sustaining objections to evidence offered for the purpose of impeaching Bauman, the chief witness for the prosecution. On cross-examination Bauman was asked if he had not tried to get one Levin to testify against defendant, and upon Levin saying he knew nothing about the case, said to him: "You don't have to know anything about it; I will tell you what to testify to." A like question was asked of Levin, to both of which the court sustained objections. The court likewise sustained objections to the introduction in evidence of a pleading, verified by Bauman as secretary of the Senegram Company, the allegations of which defendant claimed were inconsistent with some of Bauman's answers and tended to corroborate testimony given in behalf of defendant by the witness Gerecht.

[6] The state of mind of a witness, his interest in the case, hostility to, friendship for, bias and prejudice against the parties, are always proper matters for inquiry, and this is especially true where the one testifying occupied the position, as here, of prosecuting witness. People v. Thomson, 92 Cal. 506, 28 Pac. 589; People v. Wong Chuey, 117 Cal. 624, 49 Pac. 833; People v. Mack, 14 Cal. App. 12, 110 Pac. 967. As stated, it was averred in the indictment that each and every one of the answers given by Senegram in the Bauman Case was false, and the jury were instructed that if they found any of such answers false, such fact was sufficient to justify a verdict of guilty. If, therefore, the answers given by Senegram, and which the jury found to be false, were those the falsity of which depended solely and alone upon the testimony of Bauman (and there were such), then it is apparent that any abridgment of defendant's right to impeach Bauman's testimony was clearly prejudicial.

For the reasons given, the judgment and order are reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James W. Bartlett, Judge.

Action by Philip W. Tompkins against Bernhard Davidow. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Alexander D. Keyes, of San Francisco, for appellant. Walter H. Robinson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Plaintiff brought the action, in his own behalf and as assignee of other parties, to recover $5,000 paid as a deposit upon a contract for the sale and purchase of certain real estate situated on Bryant street near Fifth street in San Francisco. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, and defendant had judgment, from which and from the order denying his motion for a new trial plaintiff appeals.

The transaction shown by the findings of the court was as follows: On March 28, 1906, defendant employed George C. Boardman, Jr., and T. D. Boardman, copartners as Boardman Bros. & Co., engaged in business as real estate agents, "as his agents to procure for him a purchaser for the real property hereafter described, for an agreed compensation, and they thereupon accepted such employment"; that, on said last-named date, pursuant to such employment, they represented to defendant that they had found a purchaser for defendant's said real property, one L. A. Steiger; that, believing said representation and relying thereon, defendant did, on said March 28, 1906, enter into a contract with L. A. Steiger for the sale and purchase of the real estate mentioned in said contract, in the words and figures following, to wit:

"Boardman Bros. & Co., Real Estate Agents. 138 Montgomery St. Contract Receipt. San Francisco, March 28, 1906.

"Received from L. A. Steiger the sum of five thousand dollars ($5,000.00) being deposit on account of one hundred forty thousand ($140,000.00) dollars U. S. gold coin, the purchase price of the property this day sold to and bought by him, and being in the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, and described as follows: (Describes a 100-vara lot.) Taxes for fiscal year 1906-07 to be assumed by buyer, who is to accept the property as indicated by the survey dated March 2nd, 1906. Terms of sale: Twenty-five days are given to examine title and consummate the sale, at the termination of which the balance of purchase price is payable upon tender of deed; if title is found defective the purchaser is to state his objections in writing and the seller is to perfect the title within thirty days after the time first allowed for examination, or any extension thereof, unless the title cannot be perfected within said thirty days, in which event the same shall be perfected within a reasonable time thereafter. When title is thus perfected, "the seller is to convey said property to the purchaser, and upon a tender of said conveyance to the purchaser, the purchaser is to pay the balance of the purchase price of said property. If the sale is not consummated according to the foregoing conditions, the deposit is to be forfeited. If the title cannot be perfected within the above mentioned times, the deposit is to be returned. Taxes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, also rents to be prorated from delivery of deed. The said L. A. Steiger hereby agrees to comply with the conditions of this contract. Sale to be consummated at the office of Boardman Bros. & Co.

"Boardman Bros. & Co., Agents."

"San Francisco, March 28, 1906.

"I hereby ratify the sale of the within described property according to the terms and conditions, therein mentioned and agree to convey said property to the party therein named or to his assigns, and agree to pay to Boardman Bros. & Co. two thousand five hundred ($2,500.00) dollars, for services rendered when sale is closed and money paid and not otherwise. Receipt by me of the within mentioned deposit of five thousand ($5,000.00) dollars is hereby acknowledged subject to the terms of this contract.

"Bernhard Davidow.

"We agree to the foregoing.

"Boardman Bros. & Co."

Resulting from the great fire in San Francisco, in April, 1906, "each and every day from and including April 19, 1906, to and including June 3, 1906, were regular legal holidays in the state of California." During that fire the buildings standing upon said premises were destroyed, but the court found that they did not form a part of the real property nor did they constitute any inducement or consideration to Steiger or to plaintiff or to any of his assignors for the purchase of said property, the lessee having the right under the lease to remove the same; that at all times since March 27, 1906, defendant has been the owner of said real estate "free and clear of all incumbrances, save and except the lien of said mortgage for $80,000," as to the existence of which the court found that both Boardman Bros. and Steiger had knowledge and that it was agreed between defendant and Steiger that it should "either be assumed and the amount thereof deducted from the purchase price, or that said mortgage should be paid and satisfied out of the purchase price when the same was paid, all at the option of said L. A. Steiger, and that so much of said purchase price as would be necessary should be used to satisfy said mortgage"; that at the time said contract was executed both Steiger and the Boardmans knew of the existence of said lease and knew that pursuant to its terms the buildings on said premises "belonged to the lessee and could be severed by him at any time before the expiration of the term therein created," but neither on June 4, 1906, nor at any other time, did Steiger personally or by agent, verbally or otherwise, notify defendant that he would not accept a deed of said property "because of any defect of title or fault of defendant, nor did he at any time state any defect of title or fault of defendant as a reason for not accepting such a deed; that, on the contrary, on June 4, 1906, the defendant tendered to said L. A. Steiger a duly executed deed of conveyance of said premises in due form, and that thereupon said L. A. Steiger stated that he could not carry out his part of said contract and declined to complete said sale, and thereupon for a valuable consideration waived all claim to said deposit of $5,000 and to said real property pursuant to said contract or otherwise." Upon this latter point the court also found:

"That on June 4, 1906, said L. A. Steiger and the defendant agreed with each other to mutually terminate their respective obligations under said contract, that is to say, they agreed with each other than said Steiger should and he did waive all right to said $5,000 deposit and that he should and he did release said defendant from all obligations to convey said property, in consideration whereof said defendant released said Steiger from all obligations to purchase said property, and thereupon their respective obligations under said contract were by mutual agreement terminated and abandoned and they each thereupon became released from further obligation to each other on account of said contract and said deposit."

It was further found: That said sum of $5,000 paid to the defendant was furnished by plaintiff, the Boardman Bros., and certain other assignors of plaintiff in certain proportions, "but the fact that said plaintiff and said Boardmans and said assignors of plaintiff were in any way interested, other than that said Boardmans would earn a commission, was unknown to defendant and was not disclosed to him by any one until about May 7, 1910, when this action was commenced"; that in this respect said plaintiff and said Steiger, the said Boardmans, and said other assignors of plaintiff "led defendant to believe that the only person with whom defendant was dealing and to whom defendant was selling said property was said L. A. Steiger, and that any agreements regarding the purchase price of said real estate or the payment thereof which may have existed between plaintiff, said assignors of plaintiff, and said L. A. Steiger, were at all times concealed from and unknown to defendant until about May 7, 1910." It was also found that defendant commenced his action to establish his title under the McEnerney act, in June, 1907, and perfected his title thereunder within a reasonable time; that at no time did plaintiff or Steiger or the Boardmans, or any other person pay or offer to pay to defendant the or any part of the purchase price agreed upon, nor did defendant ever convey or offer to convey said property to any person other than said L. A. Steiger. There is a finding: That, on June 5, 1906, the Boardman Bros. left at defendant's place of business a letter, directed to him, which he received about ten days thereafter, stating that "Louis A. Steiger and all persons interested under him in the purchase of the lot (describing it) decline to accept a deed for the following reasons": That defendant has no record title. There is an existing mortgage of $80,000 on the property which the purchaser will not assume. The improvements on the property have been burnt. The lease on the property has been terminated without the consent of Steiger. Signed, "Boardman Bros. & Co., Agents."

As to this letter the court found:

That it was written by the Boardmans "in the capacity of agents of defendant, and was intended by said Boardman Bros. & Co. and was treated by defendant as information on the subject from agent to principal and not as a notification from said L. A. Steiger respecting any rights under said contract."

[1] The findings upon which the judgment of the court rested are challenged as unsupported by the evidence. It seems to us that, aside from other findings, if there was sufficient evidence to support the finding in effect that Steiger and defendant, on June 4, 1906, mutually agreed that the contract between them was at an end and that defendant should retain the money paid as a deposit as consideration for terminating the contract, it becomes unnecessary to consider other findings or any other features of the case.

There is abundant evidence to show that the Boardmans, while acting as defendant's agents, concealed from him that they and other persons were interested in the purchase and led defendant to believe that Steiger was the real purchaser. Defendant was fully justified in dealing with Steiger as sole purchaser. He knew nothing to the contrary and had no means of knowing anything to the contrary for nearly four years and long after he had with perfect right treated the contract as at an end and the matter fully settled between him and Steiger and had entered into engagements concerning the property on that assumption. It was on this assumption that, on August 8, 1906, he leased the lot for a term of years to the S. H. Harmon Lumber Company.

Defendant testified, concerning his settlement with Steiger, as follows:

"Mr. Mertens and myself went to Mr. Steiger's place of business and I presented him the deed. I asked for the money to pay for it. He said, 'Mr. Davidow, I cannot pay for it on account of the sale I made of the corner of Third and Brannan streets not going through. I haven't the money to pay you for it.' I said, 'What will become of the $5,000?' and he said: 'I am out of it. Here is the terra cotta business and that is all I have left to make my living off of.' Q. He said for you to keep the $5,000? A. He said: 'Keep it; I am out of it.' I said, 'All right,' and then we had a private conversation regarding the circumstances. Q. Did Boardman Bros. at any time following June 4, 1906, make to you any verbal statement or objection regarding the title to the property? A. No, sir."

Witness M. J. Mertens testified:

"The first conversation that I heard, or took part in, between Mr. Davidow, myself and Mr. Steiger took place on Monday, June 4, 1906, at Mr. Steiger's place of business out in the Mission. We called on Mr. Steiger, and I presented Mr. Davidow as the grantor in that transaction, and I told him we came to close the transaction. We had the deed; presented it to him, and asked him for the money, and Mr. Steiger said: 'I cannot pay for this property now. I have met with very severe losses both in my business and in real estate. Moreover, the sale on which I depended for a part of this money has fallen through, and I am therefore totally unable to comply with your request. I cannot take the property.' He said the sale of his property on the east corner of Third and Brannan streets had fallen through. Mr. Davidow broached the matter of the forfeiture of the deposit, and said: 'You know what the penalty is if you cannot comply with the contract; you will have to forfeit this deposit?' Mr. Steiger said he had no further interest in it. He was out of it. He could not take the property. He could not buy anything at that time. Q. Did he say anything as to what could be done with the $5,000? A. He understood that it was Mr. Davidow's. Q. What did Mr. Davidow say in reply? A. He said: 'If you cannot pay for the property, well, then, I have to be satisfied with the next best thing, with the deposit. But I am very sorry, because I depended on this money,' etc. That was substantially all the conversation. Thereupon we left. I went about my business, and Mr. Davidow went about his."

We think there was evidence justifying the court in its finding as to the letter of the Boardmans of June 5, 1906. But, if otherwise it was not written until after Steiger and defendant had reached a settlement of the transaction, and was not received by defendant for ten days later, and it does not appear, nor does the letter purport to show, that the Boardmans were serving notice as Steiger's agents. Nor did the Boardmans ever inform defendant that they were authorized to act as Steiger's agents.

[2,3] Upon the point which we think is conclusive of the case, the learned trial judge, in his written opinion, called to our attention, states the matter so clearly and forcibly that we adopt it as satisfactorily disposing of the question. We quote:

"The determination of this case depends upon the solution of this question: What, if any, was the legal effect of the interview between defendant and L. A. Steiger on the 4th of June, 1906? If the acts and declarations of these two men at that time mutually ended and terminated their obligations under the contract, the defendant must and should prevail in this action. That defendant considered the contract ended, and his liability to convey his land or to return the deposit released, is plainly evident from his subsequent actions in shortly thereafter leasing the lot for a long term of years and in his statement as to title and incumbrances made in the McKerney act proceeding. So far as the evidence in this case discloses, defendant never had any reason to believe that any one other than L. A. Steiger had an interest in the contract in relation to the purchase of the lot, until shortly before the institution of this action. The arrangement of the purchasing syndicate, its advance of the $5,000 paid on purchase price, the proportionate interest of its respective parties, were never disclosed to him. He had every reason to believe that, instead of Boardman Bros. & Co. being interested as secret purchasers of his lot, they were his agents to effect a sale of the same, and were to receive for their labor and efforts in effecting such sale from the purchase money the sum of $2,500. The notice of June 5, 1906, of Boardman Bros. & Co. to defendant, is entitled to little, if any, consideration. On its face it is susceptible of two readings, one assuming the firm to be the agent of defendant simply informing defendant that Steiger has repudiated his contract and stating his purported reasons for so repudiating; the other, assuming the firm to be the agent of Steiger, notifying defendant that Steiger repudiates his contract. It is signed 'Boardman Bros. & Co., Agents.' Agents for whom, Steiger, defendant, or the individual members of the firm and other members of the purchasing syndicate? Under the facts in this case, defendant had the right to consider the firm of Boardman Bros. & Co. as his agents in the transaction, and if the firm was such agent of defendant, the notice of June 5, 1906, would be of no value as a notice of objections of Steiger to defendant's title.

"On the 4th of June, 1906, both defendant and Steiger had many reasons as business men for each ending any further obligations under this contract. Steiger did not have the money to complete the purchase and as a business man undoubtedly did not desire to purchase, in view of the decreased values of real estate in San Francisco at that time, while Davidow had on his hands a lot decreased in value far more than what he had received on purchase price, with records of title destroyed and methods of restoring them uncertain if not entirely wanting. Whether the tender of the deed on June 4, 1906, was premature or not on defendant's part, is immaterial if at the interview on that day defendant and Steiger mutually ended their duties and liabilities under the contract. Where Steiger had obtained the $5,000 which had been paid on the purchase price was not a matter of any interest to defendant, and at that time he had no reason, legal or moral, to believe it was not the money of Steiger.

"There can be no question that a contract can be mutually abandoned by the parties at any stage of their performance and each of the parties released from any further obligation on account thereof; that it may be done by parol, and the fact of its having been done established by evidence of the acts and declarations of the parties. The long period of time elapsing between the tender of the deed and the institution of this action is a strong circumstance urging the conclusion that the contract was considered ended by both parties by the interview of June 4, 1906. If defendant and Steiger intended at that time by their acts and declarations to end and terminate the contract and any future liabilities thereunder, that intent should not be defeated by allowing parties never known by defendant to have had any interest in the contract until nearly four years after he supposed it was ended to come in and seek a recovery of moneys alleged to be theirs instead of Steiger's. Plaintiff's counsel suggests that Steiger was a trustee for plaintiff and his assignors, and therefore could not release the $5,000 paid the defendant on purchase price. If the relation of trustee existed between Steiger and plaintiff's assignors, defendant never knew of it, and, if it were so, under these facts the remedy would be a personal one for settlement between plaintiff and Steiger and not involving the defendant.

"In view of the conclusion that the evidence shows that the contract and its obligations were mutually and voluntarily terminated by defendant and Steiger, it becomes unnecessary to discuss the various other matters so ably and fully presented by the briefs submitted by counsel in this action.

"Findings and judgment in favor of the defendant are ordered prepared and submitted by the attorney for the defendant in this action.

"James A. Bartlett, Judge Presiding."

No assignments of errors in rulings during the course of the trial are presented in plaintiff's brief.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

In an action for a decree foreclosing a mortgage executed to secure the payment of a note, a complaint, alleging that the defendants executed the note set out therein and as security executed and delivered the mortgage, that the balance due on the principal of the note and the interest thereon was due and unpaid, that the plaintiff exercised its option and declared the whole amount of principal and interest to be immediately payable, showed the ownership of the note at the time of execution of the mortgage, which condition of ownership was presumed to continue, so that it was not necessary to directly allege delivery of the note or that the plaintiff was the owner of the note at the time of its exercise of the option.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by the Rock Ridge Park Company against C. B. Wells and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wright & Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco (J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, of counsel), for appellants. Elmer Nichols, of Berkeley, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action for a decree foreclosing a certain mortgage executed and delivered by the defendants to the plaintiff to secure the payment of a promissory note for the sum of $48,000, which was executed by said defendants in favor of the plaintiff.

The note in suit, which is set out in the complaint in hæc verba, was made and is dated on the 15th day of March, 1912, and was payable "on or before," three years after its date. It called for interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, payable annually, and further provided:

"And in case said interest is not paid within one month after the same becomes due, it shall be added to the principal and bear a like rate of interest until paid, and the whole of said principal and interest shall forthwith become due, at the option of the holder thereof, without notice."

This action was filed on the 8th day of May, 1913, and it is alleged in the complaint:

"That no interest on said principal sum mentioned in said promissory note, and in said mortgage, has been paid; that on the 27th day of November, 1912, the sum of $4,600, in United States gold coin, on account of the principal sum mentioned in said promissory note and mortgage, had been paid; that no part of the balance of said principal to wit, the sum of $44,300, has been paid, and the whole thereof is now due, owing and unpaid from said defendant, C. B. Wells, to plaintiff," etc.

The complaint further alleges that:

On the 16th day of April, 1912, "and during the time of default in payment of interest, and more than one month after the same became due, the said plaintiff, * * * etc., exercised its option to declare, and did declare, the whole amount of principal and interest to be immediately due and payable, and the same is now due and payable, as heretofore alleged."

It is then alleged that:

"The plaintiff is now the lawful owner and holder of said promissory note and said mortgage."

The mortgage is by the complaint expressly made a part thereof, and that instrument contains a copy of the note pleaded in full in the complaint.

A demurrer to the complaint for want of sufficient facts was filed by the defendants, and the same overruled. The defendants failed to answer the complaint within the time allowed by the court after the order overruling the demurrer, and a decree was thereupon entered in favor of the plaintiff. This appeal is by the defendants from said judgment.

[1, 2] The only point made by the defendants is that the complaint fails to state a cause of action because it omits to allege that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the note at the time it exercised the option, prescribed by the note, to declare and treat the whole of the principal of and the accrued interest on the note as due and payable upon the default in the payment of the annual interest for one month after such interest became due. We think the point is groundless. All the material facts stated in the complaint are admitted to be true by the demurrer. It is declared in the complaint that the defendants executed the note in suit and set out in the complaint, and as security therefor executed and delivered to the plaintiff the mortgage to foreclose which is the object of this action. It is further alleged, as seen, that the balance due on the principal of the note and the interest thereon have not been paid, and that "the whole thereof is now due, owing and unpaid from said defendant, C. B. Wells, to plaintiff." It is, moreover, alleged that the plaintiff exercised its option to declare, and did declare, the whole amount of principal and interest to be immediately due and payable, etc. If this last-mentioned averment is not sufficient of itself to show ownership in the plaintiff at the time of the exercise of the option, then the allegations just previously referred to certainly show such ownership at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage, and this condition of ownership at that time is presumed to continue, and it was therefore not necessary to directly allege that the plaintiff was the owner of the note at the time of the exercise of the option. "Such an allegation, or its equivalent," says the Supreme Court, in Curtin v. Kowalsky, 145 Cal. 431, 433, 78 Pac. 962, involving an action to recover upon a money judgment, "is required in actions to recover the possession of specific property, but not in actions to recover on money demands," citing a number of cases. See, also, 8 Cyc. 123, 124.

[3] It is true, as counsel for the defendants suggest, that there is no averment in the complaint that the note in question was ever delivered to the plaintiff. Since we hold that the complaint sufficiently shows that the plaintiff was the owner and holder of the note at the time of the exercise of the option referred to, we cannot see that it is important that it should appear from the complaint by direct averment that the note was delivered to the plaintiff. But, if the objection to the complaint here suggested be important, the reply thereto is to be found in the fact that the complaint alleges that the mortgage was delivered to the plaintiff upon its execution, and from this, as well as from the very nature of the transaction, the fact necessarily follows and the presumption of law, based upon the common experience of mankind, is or should be that the note was delivered contemporaneously with the delivery to the mortgagee of the mortgage given to secure its payment.

The complaint could have been more explicit and specific in the respects as to which it is criticized on this appeal; but, considering all its averments together, by the light of the nature of the transaction to which it relates and the character of the relief sought, we are convinced that it sufficiently, even if inartificially, states a cause of action, and is therefore good as against a general demurrer.

DEPAVO et al. v. RIZZO et al. (Civ. 1494.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 21, 1915.)

1. BROKERS —8— AGENCY FOR OWNER—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action by purchasers of realty against the owner and a real estate agent to recover a deposit of $500, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that the broker was not agent of the owner.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by F. Depavo and Luigi Giachino against N. Rizzo and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed as to the appellant.

Stetson & Koford, of San Francisco, for appellant. Aldrich & Gentry, of Oakland, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This action, in form one for money had and received, was brought to recover the sum of $500 paid as a deposit on a contract for the purchase of a parcel of real estate. Judgment went in favor of the plaintiffs and against defendants N. Rizzo and Elizabeth Piepenberg jointly for the amount sued for. This is an appeal from the judgment by N. Rizzo.

In support of his appeal the appellant contends that the evidence shows that he was the agent of the owner of the real property involved; that he performed his contract with such owner; that the owner was not in default in the performance of the contract, and that even if she were, the plaintiffs cannot recover from appellant (the agent) money paid as a deposit for account of the principal, but must look to the principal for it.

The facts of the case are substantially these: The plaintiffs, desiring to rent a store for the purpose of carrying on their business as bakers, applied to the defendant Rizzo, a real estate broker, requesting that he endeavor to find for them a suitable place, which Rizzo undertook to do. None being found, Rizzo suggested to them that perhaps he could find a lot which they could buy and erect thereon a building for themselves. The plaintiffs assented to this course, and soon thereafter Rizzo notified them that he had found a suitable location. Plaintiffs examined it, and expressed their willingness to pay for it the sum of $10,100. The owner of this property was the defendant Elizabeth Piepenberg, who appears in the transaction from beginning to end, by her agent or attorney in fact, the defendant L. R. Weil. On April 17, 1913, the plaintiffs met Rizzo and Weil in the former's office, and entered into a written contract for the purchase of the property in question at the price of $10,100, of which $500 was to be paid down, and the balance upon certain terms specified therein. Ten days were provided in the contract for the purchasers to examine title and state their objections thereto; the vendor to have 30 days thereafter to remedy any defects. On the same day, but just prior to the execution of the aforesaid contract, another agreement in writing had been entered into between Rizzo and Elizabeth Piepenberg, through her said agent L. R. Weil, by which said Piepenberg agreed to sell and convey to the plaintiffs the same property, but for the sum of $9,660, of which $100 was to be in cash, the remaining terms being for all practical purposes similar to the terms of the contract just described. There is nothing, however, to show that the plaintiffs had any knowledge of the existence of this second mentioned agreement. For the purpose of making the cash payment required on their contract the plaintiffs handed to Rizzo at the time of its execution the sum of $500. Rizzo thereupon paid to Weil $100, retaining the balance. Plaintiffs in due time stated certain objections to the title to the property, which the owner, through her agent Weil, proceeded to remedy; but this not being accomplished within the time prescribed by the contract, and the plaintiffs having refused to extend such time, they demanded of Weil and of Rizzo the return of the $500 paid by them. It not being returned, this action was commenced for its recovery as above stated.

In the court below it was the claim of Rizzo that he was the agent of the owner of the property; and one of the arguments that he advances here upon his appeal is that, being the agent of a disclosed principal, no action will lie against him for the return of the money, even though it be in his possession. This principle finds support in the case of Bogart v. Crosby, etc., 80 Cal. 195, 22 Pac. 84. See, also, Simmonds v. Long, 80 Kan. 155, 101 Pac. 1070, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 553. The court, however, found that Rizzo was not the agent of the owner of the property; and also found that said owner and Rizzo should repay to the plaintiffs the $500 paid as aforesaid.

[1] As to the first of these findings, we think that it is abundantly supported by the evidence. There is no showing of any employment of Rizzo by the owner or by her agent. On the other hand, the facts as above narrated, and the form in which Rizzo endeavored to put the sale through, indicate that he was either the agent of the plaintiffs, or that he was acting on his own account. The plaintiffs' testimony showed that they considered that Rizzo was acting for them, and this was evidently the view they took when they handed to him the $500 to be paid as a deposit on their contract. The appellant himself, apparently, was not clear in what capacity he was acting, for in his testimony we find this (speaking of a conversation with one of the plaintiffs when there appeared to be danger that the transaction would fall through):

"I told him it didn't make any difference to me; somebody had to pay me that commission. I didn't care who paid it, because I done my duty, and I expected to get a commission from some one."

[2] We think, however, that the court's finding of a joint liability on the part of the appellant and his codefendant Elizabeth Piepenberg is not sustained by the evidence. Rizzo received from the plaintiffs $500, which they intended should be paid to the owner as a deposit on their contract. But he, at this time, had in his possession a binding contract for the conveyance of the same land to the plaintiffs, which called for a deposit of only $100, and this sum is all that he paid to the owner. There is no evidence, unless it be a very doubtful inference, that the plaintiffs knew of this contract. Having established their right to recover the $500, we think it is clear that the liability to the plaintiffs on the part of the appellant and Elizabeth Piepenberg was not joint but several, and consisted of an obligation to repay the amount which they respectively received, viz., $400 and $100, if the appellant was acting as the agent of the plaintiffs, or of an obligation on the part of Rizzo to repay the whole amount if he was acting as a principal. The case of Robinson v. Easton, Eldridge & Co., 93 Cal. 80, 28 Pac. 796, 27 Am. St. Rep. 167, presents some features similar to the case at bar. Easton, Eldridge & Co. were the authorized agents of Robinson for the sale of a parcel of land, but under a contract by which their compensation was to be the excess received for the land over the sum of $10,000. The agents entered into a contract with a prospective purchaser at a price of $10,500. A deposit on the contract having been made with the agents, it was subsequently returned by them to the purchaser in pursuance of one of the conditions of the contract of sale. Thereafter Robinson sued the agents for this sum, claiming that it belonged to him immediately it was received by them; but it was held that the fact that the agents had an interest on their own account in the price to be received for the land clothed them with certain of the rights of a principal, as distinguished from the obligations of an agent. It may well be that in the present case the difference between the amounts of the first payment called for by the two contracts of sale, viz., the sum of $400, remained in the hands of Rizzo as a principal.

It is also insisted by the appellant that the plaintiffs were not entitled to recover the amount of their deposit without a tender of performance upon their part, that time was not of the essence of this contract, and that therefore the vendor was entitled to a reasonable time, after the expiration of the 30 days allowed in the contract, in which to perfect her title.

[3] It is not necessary, in order that time shall be of the essence of a contract that it shall be so declared in those words. Any provision in the contract from which that intention clearly appears is sufficient. Martin v. Morgan, 87 Cal. 203, 25 Pac. 350, 22 Am. St. Rep. 240. In the present case the return of the deposit is specifically provided for by the contract in the event that good title could not be given within the time allowed. It was admitted by the defendant Weil, the vendor's agent, as a witness at the trial, that his principal could not comply with this requirement of the contract. The plaintiffs therefore were entitled to the return of their money under the affirmative provisions of the agreement.

The finding of the court that the appellant and his codefendant Piepenberg received $500 to the use of the plaintiffs not being, in our opinion, supported by the evidence, the judgment against this appellant must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

DEPAVO et al. v. RIZZO et al.
(Civ. No. 1555.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. April 21, 1915.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. H. Donahue, Judge.

Action by F. Depavo and Luigi Giachino against Elizabeth Piepenberg and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. E. Rode, of Oakland, and Rose & Glidden and Stetson & Koford, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Aldrich & Gentry, of Oakland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the judgment by the defendant Elizabeth Piepenberg and from an order denying her motion for a new trial.

The facts are the same as in the case bearing the same name as the present but numbered 1494, this day decided (149 Pac. 793). Both appeals are from the same judgment, but taken by different defendants and by different methods. The points here urged in support of the appeal are there considered and decided, and the conclusion reached that the case should be reversed. For the reasons there given the judgment against this appellant should also be reversed, as also the order denying her motion for a new trial, and it is so ordered.

PEOPLE v. CUIN. (Cr. 383.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW — 1169 — HARMLESS ERROR — ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE — IDENTITY.

In a prosecution for the larceny of a cow belonging to L., where the evidence was conflicting as to whether the cow which defendant sold to a third person was the cow belonging to L., the admission of evidence that witness obtained from defendant and his brothers a light-colored Jersey cow, which L. claimed had disappeared at the same time as the cow which defendant sold, and that such Jersey cow had been removed from the witness' pasture and shot and killed, was reversible error, where the prosecution had in no way connected defendant with the theft of the second cow.

2. WITNESSES — 370 — IMPEACHMENT — ILLICIT RELATIONS WITH DEFENDANT.

In a prosecution for the larceny of a cow owned by a named person, who had leased it with others to the one from whose possession it was taken, evidence of the lessee's illicit relations with the defendant was not admissible to impeach the lessee's credibility.

3. CRIMINAL LAW — 1043 — APPEAL — NECESSITY OF OBJECTION BELOW — MISCONDUCT OF DISTRICT ATTORNEY.

Where defendant, at the trial, did not specifically assign the district attorney's misconduct as the basis for his objection to the attempt to introduce inadmissible evidence, his misconduct was not reviewable.

6. CRIMINAL LAW — 761 — INSTRUCTIONS — ASSUMPTION OF FACT.

In a prosecution for grand larceny, an instruction that, to constitute larceny, there must be a felonious and fraudulent taking of the property with the intent to deprive the owner of its use, and that such taking must be accompanied by the removal, but that such removal was sufficient, was ambiguous.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

U. S. Cuin was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Reversed.

O. V. Willson and Willson & Frazier, all of El Centro, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and R. M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of grand larceny and sentenced to serve a term in the state penitentiary. There was a motion for a new trial, and an appeal was then taken from the judgment and from the order denying that motion.

The subject of the alleged larceny was a certain cow belonging to one Lammers. By the testimony it was shown that Lammers, being the owner of a lot of cows, leased 11 of them to a Mrs. Elliott, who was conducting a dairy a short distance from the town of El Centro, in Imperial county. Mrs. Elliott received the cows in July, 1914. In September Lammers visited the Elliott ranch and found only 9 of the 11 cows there. He was told that the two had jumped out of the field into another pasture. At another time, as Lammers testified, Mrs. Elliott stated that the 2 cows had strayed off. Upon making a search for the missing cows, Lammers discovered on the ranch of one Gibson, which was several miles away, the carcass of a cow, with the hide, head, and horns, which he identified as being those of one of the missing cows. The color of the hide, he testified, was like that of his cow, but he particularly based his identification upon the peculiar shape of one of the horns, which was misshapen or "drooped." By other testimony it was shown that Gibson had purchased this cow from the defendant, and that the animal had shortly thereafter been mysteriously shot, from the effects of which it died within a few days. It appeared that the defendant had from time to time, for a number of years, been in the employ of Mrs. Elliott, and that he was in her employ at the time when the two cows were missed from the herd. Lammers testified that all of the cows which he leased to Mrs. Elliott, but one, were without horns, and that he had agreed with Mrs. Elliott that she might dehorn that animal, and that he would allow her $1 therefor, which he afterwards paid. Mrs. Elliott testified that the animal was dehorned by the defendant at her order, and that she saw the "bloody horns" after the operation had been performed and also milked the cow after her horns had been removed. The father of the defendant testified to having sold to defendant a cow answering the description of the one which defendant sold to Gibson. This statement does not include all of the evidence, but sufficient is shown to make it appear that there was a decided conflict in the testimony as to whether the cow which defendant had sold to Gibson was the cow of Lammers. If the testimony as to the dehorning of the animal was true, then, of course, the head and horns inspected by Lammers could not have been those of either of the animals which had been separated from the lot of 11 cows leased to Mrs. Elliott.

[1] Under this state of conflict of evidence, we think the court committed prejudicial error in allowing certain testimony to be admitted over the objection of the appellant. It appeared that defendant had several brothers. While a witness named Dunegan was on the stand the district attorney asked the following question: "Q. Did you obtain from the Cuin boys a light-colored Jersey cow?" This question was objected to, and the court inquired as to whether this related to any of the stock that had been referred to, and the district attorney replied: "Yes, sir; this is in regard to that light-colored Jersey cow which Mr. Lammers said disappeared at the same time this cow that Mr. Gibson got." The court thereupon overruled the objection, and the witness answered the question: "A. Yes, sir." When asked what became of that cow, he answered that she had been removed from his pasture and taken about a mile away and shot and killed. The prosecution had not in any way connected the appellant with the theft of the second cow, and the effect of this testimony was to intimate to the jury that some of the Cuin brothers had stolen that cow. The fact that she had also been shot in a mysterious way, as intimated by the witness, would have a tendency to cause the jury to assume that the defendant was in some way connected with the theft of the other cow when he was not charged with having stolen it. The same witness testified that he had sworn to a complaint charging another one of the Cuin boys with having stolen this second cow. It is altogether probable that the jury took into consideration this testimony as indicating the guilt of defendant, because it appeared that some other members of his family had had a part in disposing of the second cow belonging to Lammers.

[2] Objection was made at the trial, and it is renewed here as illustrating error, that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in his examination of certain witnesses. It does appear that improper questions were asked of Mrs. Elliott tending to impute to her illicit relations with the defendant, which method of impeaching the credibility of a witness is not permissible.

[3] However, as to all of the matters wherein misconduct of the district attorney is charged, it does not appear that at the trial appellant specifically assigned misconduct as the basis for his objections. These errors, therefore, are not reviewable. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 140 Pac. 256, and cases therein cited.

[4] It was within the discretion of the court to allow a witness to be called in rebuttal and to give testimony which more properly should have been introduced on the main case for the prosecution, where the defendant was allowed an opportunity to rebut such testimony, if he desired. It does not appear that he was denied that right.

[5] We do not think that the failure of the court to give an instruction specifically defining reasonable doubt, in the absence of a request therefor, was error.

[6, 7] Among the instructions given are two, which are justly subject to the criticism which appellant makes of them: One was to the effect that if the jury believed from the evidence that the defendant was found "with the stolen property in his possession," etc. This instruction improperly assumed that the cow had been shown to have been stolen, when the fact was one directly in issue and, under the testimony, a debatable question. Another instruction given was as follows:

"The jury is instructed that, to constitute larceny, there must be a felonious and fraudulent taking of the property with the intent to deprive the owner of its use. The taking must be accompanied by the removal, but such removal is sufficient."

This instruction is ambiguous and may have been misleading to the jury. In a clear case it should not perhaps be said that these errors in the instructions were sufficient to warrant a reversal, but taking the matter of the improper introduction of the testimony mentioned, together with the other errors noted, we think it is evident from the entire record that there has been in this case a miscarriage of justice.

The judgment and order are reversed.

A complaint which alleges the transfer of stock to secure a note, and that the payee refused to accept payment of the note or return the stock, and prays for cancellation of the note and a retransfer of the stock, states a cause of action on the theory that the transaction was a pledge and not a sale of the stock or as invoking the equitable remedy of cancellation, and does not state a cause of action in claim and delivery.

5. CORPORATIONS ⇨123—STOCK—PLEDGE—PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

A complaint, praying for the cancellation of a note and the retransfer of corporate stock pledged to secure it, need not allege actual fraud by the payee in securing the signature of the maker to an instrument transferring the stock to the payee, subject to an option to the maker to repurchase within a specified time, to permit evidence that the instrument was not intended to evidence a sale, for the act of the payee in claiming ownership of the stock was an essential ingredient of the action, and the fraud, if any, of the payee, could be proved, provided the complaint pleaded the facts of the transaction sufficient to raise the implication of fraud, or showing that the claim of the payee, if sustained, would work a fraud on the rights of the maker.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Jas. M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Albert E. Golden against Oscar Fischer and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

West & de Journal, of San Francisco (T. C. West, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Jas. H. Boyer, of San Francisco, for respondent Golden. Seidenberg & Davis, of San Francisco, for respondent National Wireless Telephone & Telegraph Co.

HART, J. The object of this suit is to obtain a decree for the cancellation and surrendering to the plaintiff of a certain promissory note, executed and delivered to the appellant by the plaintiff's assignor, and for the retransfer of 80,000 shares of stock in the Aerial Telephone & Power Company, a corporation, which were pledged by the plaintiff's assignor to the appellant to secure the payment of said note. The action was tried by the court sitting without a jury, and the plaintiff was given judgment, from which this appeal, supported by a bill of exceptions, is presented by the defendant Fischer.

The complaint states that the plaintiff's assignor, Frank J. Golden, on or about the 23d day of June, 1911, borrowed from the defendant Oscar Fischer the sum of $1,000, gave the latter his promissory note as evidence thereof, payable on the 23d day of September, 1911, and as security for its payment pledged, assigned, and delivered to said Fischer 80,000 shares of the capital stock of the Aerial Telephone & Power Company; that on the 1st day of April, 1912, the said Aerial Company by due legal proceedings had in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, was dissolved, and the directors thereof ordered to distribute its property to its stockholders, in proportion to the amount of stock held by said stockholders; that prior to the dissolution so effected the Aerial Company transferred and conveyed to the defendant National Wireless Telephone & Telegraph Company all its assets and property for and in consideration of the transfer to said Aerial Company of 700,000 shares of the capital stock of said defendant Wireless Company, and that in the distribution of the assets of the Aerial Company the plaintiff's assignor became entitled to 80,000 shares of said Wireless Company; that the stock pledged to the defendant Fischer, as above explained, entitled the plaintiff's assignor to 80,000 shares of the capital stock of the said Wireless Company.

It is further alleged that the said Frank J. Golden was the sole and exclusive owner of said stock on the 23d day of June, 1911, on which day, as seen, he transferred the same as a pledge to Fischer to secure said note; that the appellant has never sold said stock or foreclosed said pledge; that on the 23d day of August, 1912 (the day immediately preceding that upon which this action was instituted), said Frank J. Golden tendered to Fischer the amount of the indebtedness then due on said note, but that Fischer then refused "and still refuses" to accept payment of said indebtedness or to return the said stock to the said Frank J. Golden or to the plaintiff; that, on said 23d day of August, 1912, said Golden assigned to the plaintiff said stock and any cause of action accruing in his favor and against the defendants by reason of the transaction described in the complaint. The complaint also contains averments entitling the plaintiff to pendente lite injunctive protection against the sale or other disposition of the stock by Fischer.

The complaint was not challenged on special grounds, but the defendant Fischer interposed thereto a general demurrer, which was overruled, and thereupon he replied to the complaint by way of a plea in confession and avoidance. Thus he admitted that the stock referred to in the complaint was pledged to him by Frank J. Golden to secure the latter's promissory note, mentioned in the complaint, but alleged that, on or about the 7th day of June, 1912, "the said Frank J. Golden, by an instrument in writing, in consideration of the cancellation of the said debt then due, owing, and unpaid by him to this defendant as aforesaid, sold, conveyed, transferred, and delivered to this defendant all his right, title, and interest in and to the said stock." Certain other allegations of the complaint, to wit, that Fischer, after the note became due and payable, agreed to extend the time for its payment from month to month, that on the 23d day of August, 1912, there remained due Fischer on said note the sum of $1,100, or any other sum, that said Golden, on the 23d day of August, 1912, tendered Fischer full payment of said note, and that said Golden demanded the cancellation and return of said note, are denied.

[1, 2] The point first submitted by the appellant is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the first amended complaint. The contention is that this is an action in claim and delivery, and that, to state such a cause of action, it is essential that the complaint should expressly aver that the plaintiff is the owner or entitled to the possession of the property so sought to be reclaimed, and that the complaint here nowhere contains such an averment. As we view this action, the ultimate purpose thereof is, substantially, to secure a decree declaring that the transaction involved here constituted a pledge, rather than the sale of the property in dispute, and is analogous to an action to have a deed, absolute upon its face, declared to have been intended by the parties to operate as a mortgage only. But, if this view of the nature of the relief here sought be, strictly speaking, incorrect, it is nevertheless true that the remedy invoked by the prayer of the complaint and which is justified by the averments thereof, while necessarily having the effect, upon the granting of the relief appropriate thereto, of establishing in the plaintiff the ownership of the stock and the right to the return thereof (conditioned, of course, upon the payment of the indebtedness for which it was pledged) is not appropriate to claim and delivery but is the equitable remedy of cancellation. We therefore conclude that in no view is the action claim and delivery in form.

Conceding, however, for the purposes of this decision, that the action is in claim and delivery, still we believe that the complaint, as against a general demurrer, meets the requirement of such an action in the particular as to which it is thus challenged. All through that pleading it is alleged that Frank J. Golden was the owner of the stock in question up to and including the 23d day of August, 1912, when, it is alleged, he assigned the stock and his right to sue for it to the plaintiff, and the plaintiff brought this action the day following said assignment, alleging that the stock had previously been assigned to him. This case, therefore, comes squarely within the rule as laid down in the cases of Irish v. Sunderhaus, 122 Cal. 308, 54 Pac. 1113, and Krieger v. Feeny, 14 Cal. App. 543, 112 Pac. 903, wherein it is held that, where a complaint alleges that the claim upon which the plaintiff declares "was duly assigned to this plaintiff before the commencement of this action," the pleading, while perhaps insufficient to withstand the attack of a special demurrer, is good as against a general demurrer.

[3] It is next insisted that the findings are not supported by the evidence, but there is clearly no substantial ground for such an objection here, as a brief examination of the testimony will readily disclose. As stated in the complaint, Frank J. Golden, on the 23d day of June, 1911, borrowed from the defendant Fischer the sum of $1,000, gave the latter his note therefor payable three months from its date, and, to secure the repayment of the money so borrowed, pledged to Fischer 80,000 shares of stock of the Aerial Company. This stock, so a witness testified, was worth about 15 cents per share, or $11,000 in excess of the sum to secure the repayment of which it was pledged.

Golden testified that he paid the interest on the note and that, about the time of the date of its maturity (September 23, 1911), an oral understanding was had between him and Fischer that the time of the payment of the principal should be postponed or extended from month to month. Agreeably to this understanding, the note was on said September 23d renewed, the interest having been paid up to that date, upon the further understanding that from that time on Golden was to pay interest on the note at the rate of $25 per month in advance. Thus the matter stood until the 7th day of June, 1912, when Golden, at the request of Fischer, signed a document presented to him by the latter, and which purported to evidence the sale of said stock by Golden to Fischer. The instrument recited the fact of the indebtedness of Golden to Fischer, as evidenced by the promissory note of the former, the fact of the pledging of the stock in question to secure the payment of said indebtedness, and the fact that said indebtedness "was now past due and unpaid," and concluded with a statement that "it is hereby mutually agreed by and between said parties that said debt shall be and is hereby canceled, and said stock shall now become the property of Oscar Fischer," and that "said Frank J. Golden, his successors or assigns, or the bearer of the duplicate of this agreement, shall have the right or option to purchase said stock at any time to the 23d day of July, 1912, for the sum of $1,100."

Explaining the motive for the execution of the foregoing document, Golden testified that, just prior to its execution, Fischer called at his (Golden's) office and said to him that he had been advised that, in case "anything happened" to Golden and it became necessary to enforce a collection of the note, he (Fischer) would be compelled to bring an action, obtain a judgment, and then sell the stock under an execution, and then proposed, in order to avoid the expense and trouble of an action, that Golden sign the instrument above referred to. Fischer added:

"Now, if you will sign this agreement, the matters can run on just the same as they have heretofore. You may pay the interest as you have paid it, and when you are ready, you may take up the stock."

Golden replied that he was willing to sign the agreement, but that he would consider the transaction in the same light as it always had been. Golden further said to Fischer that he had received several offers to buy the stock, but had refused them. He also said that a Mr. Goldman would lend him the money to take up the stock whenever he desired to do so. Fischer replied that he (Golden) "had just as well let this loan stand until he (Fischer) needed the money." Thereupon, with the distinct understanding that the nature of the transaction as it was originally executed should not thereby be changed or affected, Golden signed the instrument or agreement, to which Fischer also subscribed his name.

The promissory note was not, at the time of the execution of said agreement, nor at any other time, redelivered by Fischer to

Golden; the former still holding it when the trial of this action took place. Frank J. Golden testified that he received no money or property of any other kind, or was given no promise of money or other property by Fischer or any other person, for signing the agreement. On the 23d day of July, 1912, which was the last day of the time within which, under the agreement, Golden or his successors in interest might exercise the "option" of "repurchasing" the stock, Golden called on Fischer and offered to take up the note and the stock by the payment of the amount then due; but, according to Golden's testimony, Fischer refused the offer, saying to Golden: "Let it run another month. I don't want the money to-day." It was then agreed between them that the time for the payment of the money be extended to the 23d day of August, 1912. On the 22d day of August, 1912, Golden met Fischer at an office in the Mills Building, San Francisco, and, testified Golden:

"I told him that I would be ready to pay him the $1,125 due on this loan on the following day, the 23d, the day upon which it was due. Mr. Fischer was first evasive, and then he finally said 'Frank, I don't believe I will let you have that stock; that stock is mine.' 'Well,' I says, 'how do you make that out?' 'Well,' he says, 'you didn't take it up on the 23d of July, as you agreed, and I have decided to keep the stock.'"

Golden thereupon stated to Fischer that he (Golden) had the money with which to pay the debt and would have it in his (Golden's) office between 12 and 1 o'clock the following day, August 23d. Fischer replied that he would not accept the money, but would retain the stock. Fischer, however, finally promised Golden that he would call at the latter's office the next day between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock; but he failed to keep his promise. Thereafter, and on said 23d day of August, Golden, with the sum of $1,125 in gold (the amount of the debt) in his possession and accompanied by the plaintiff, called at the residence of Fischer, the latter having no office at that time, for the purpose of paying off the indebtedness. Fischer was not then at his residence, according to information Golden received there, and he repeated the visit to said residence four different times thereafter on that day, with the same result. Golden then prepared a letter, addressed to Fischer, and deposited the same under the door of the latter's residence, in which he informed Fischer that he (Golden) had remained at his office between the hours of 12 and 1 o'clock that day, but that Fischer failed to keep his promise to be at said office at that time; that he thereupon visited his (Fischer's) residence, at No. 488 Frederick street, "several times this afternoon and evening to pay you the sum of $1,125, the amount due you, * * * but received no response to the door bell"; that "I am prepared to pay you said sum of $1,125 in United States gold coin, and also any and all other sums due you on my promissory note or otherwise, and demand from you the cancellation of said note and the retransfer of said 80,000 shares of stock." The letter, continuing, concluded as follows:

"Please call at my office, 802 Hewes Building, San Francisco, and receive said money, or telephone me at my office, Douglass 832, and I will meet you at any place you designate and pay all sums of money due you and receive said note and stock."

Fischer made no reply to said letter, nor would he ever receive the money from Golden in extinguishment of the obligation evidenced by Golden's note.

Annie Miller, stenographer in Frank J. Golden's office, testified that she was present in said office on the 23d day of July, 1912, when the defendant, Fischer, was there, and that she heard the latter say to Golden, "Well, Frank, we will let our matter go until next month;" to which Golden replied, "Well, Mr. Fischer, if you need the money, I have made arrangements with Mr. Goldman, and I can get it for you." Fischer retorted, "Oh, that's all right; you have got enough trouble this month [referring to a death which occurred in Golden's family a few days previously]; I won't need it until next month."

We have now presented a synopsis of all the testimony introduced in the case, and to which the appellant affirmatively vouchsafed no reply by way of proof. The defendant Fischer moved for a nonsuit on the close of the plaintiff's case, and the same was denied.

[4] There is hardly any necessity for a discussion here of the effect of the testimony, for it plainly speaks for itself. No one can read it and find any possible reason for doubting that it not only amply supports, but that it justified, the finding that the transaction of June 7, 1912, whereby the parties to this appeal executed the agreement purporting to be evidence of the sale of the stock by Golden to Fischer, did not in fact constitute a sale, and that it was not intended or understood to operate as such. The character and the language of the instrument itself seem to us to sustain the testimony of Golden upon that point. It is not, in form, strictly a bill of sale, which is ordinarily the mode of evidencing the transfer of title to personal property, even though such an instrument as the one here might, under certain conceivable circumstances (not present here), properly be so construed. It is a bilateral agreement and between a pledgor and pledgee of the stock, and, considered by the light of the only testimony in the case, undoubtedly it was intended to mean that, within the time specified, Golden or his successors or assigns, "or the bearer of the duplicate of this agreement," may secure a return of the stock by paying the amount of Golden's indebtedness to Fischer.

But even if the agreement, upon its face, might be construed according to the view of the appellant, it is very plain that such a construction, under the testimony as to the value of the stock, would lead to an obvious absurdity, and the rule is that, where the language of a contract is not altogether free from ambiguity as to its meaning, such language must not be given an interpretation which would involve an absurdity. Section 1638, Civ. Code. The disparity between the value of the stock, as fixed by the witness Leon Goldman, a stockbroker, and the amount for which Fischer claims to have purchased it from Frank J. Golden, is so great as to irresistibly lead to the conclusion that the latter could not have intended the transaction as a sale. It is scarcely necessary to suggest that no one in his right senses would transfer the title to property of the approximate value of $12,000 to another in consideration of a promissory note for the sum of $1,125. Nor is it probable, if the transaction had been intended as a sale that the vendor would not have insisted upon a cancellation and redelivery to him, at the time of the sale, of his promissory note, which constituted, according to the agreement, the sole consideration for the alleged transfer. But, even if the transaction was intended as a sale, Golden had the absolute right or option to repurchase the stock within the time specified in the agreement; and that he offered to "repurchase" it within said time, as the court found was true, is borne out by the undisputed testimony of Golden, the appellant himself, however, at that time insisting that the matter of the "repurchase" be postponed for another month from the last day of said time, and Golden agreeing thereto, and renewing his offer at the time to which it was thus extended.

But we have sufficiently dwelt upon the point that the evidence does not support the findings of fact vital to the support of the judgment. As before stated, there is no possible ground to support the claim that it does not. In fact, so far as this claim is concerned, this appeal is not even within the shadow of a foundation for its support.

[5] It is next claimed that the court seriously erred, with resultant damage to the rights of the appellant, in allowing parol evidence showing that the transaction of June 7, 1912, did not involve a sale, or was not intended to change the legal relations of the parties as they had up to that time existed. It seems to be the view of learned counsel that, to render parol testimony admissible for the purpose of showing that an instrument of the character of the one here was not intended to have the effect which its language might imply, it is necessary to charge in the complaint actual fraud or coercion or some other illegal means in the procurement of the execution of the writing. But we hold this to be an erroneous view so far as it is sought to be applied to the case at bar. It was not requisite to plead actual fraud or a resort to other illegal methods in securing the signature of Golden to the agreement to justify the admission of testimony, extrinsic to the agreement itself, showing or tending to show that said instrument was not intended to stand as the evidence of a sale. Indeed, there was no evidence to support allegations of actual fraud or coercion in the procurement of the execution of the agreement, and the agreement, in its conception, inception, and execution, so far as the evidence gives any direct information on the subject, might have been characterized by perfect good faith on the part of Fischer and with the intention in him then that it should operate as Golden testified was the understood purpose of the parties with respect thereto at the time of its execution. The fraud, so far as there is any direct disclosure upon that subject by the proofs, arose in the subsequent act of Fischer in attempting to treat the agreement as an evidence of a sale of the property rather than as a pledge thereof to secure a debt vastly less in amount than the value of the property. The facts as to his conduct in claiming ownership of the stock upon his construction of the agreement speak for themselves, and, if fraud was an essential ingredient of the action, it was only necessary to plead the facts of the transaction as they occurred to raise the implication of fraud, or to show that the claim of Fischer, if sustained, would work a fraud upon the just rights of Golden.

[6] But it is as firmly settled as any rule of law may be that parol testimony is competent to show that a deed, absolute upon its face, was not, as a matter of fact, intended to convey the absolute fee, but to operate only as a mortgage, and this relief is available in such a case, even if there was no actual fraud imputed to the mortgagee in the transaction. It is only necessary to refer to a few cases lucidly explaining and aptly applying this principle. See Peninsula, etc., Co. v. Pacific S. W. Co., 123 Cal. 694, 56 Pac. 604; Woods v. Jensen, 130 Cal. 206, 62 Pac. 473; Couts v. Winston, 153 Cal. 690, 96 Pac. 357.

[7] There is no reason in principle why the same rule should not appropriately be applied where the subject of the transaction is personal property, and we hold that it does, and that the rulings complained of did not contravene the rule forbidding the alteration, or variation, or modification of a written instrument by parol testimony, and were therefore legally proper and correct.

There are some other rulings admitting certain testimony to which exceptions were reserved, and which are here urged as having been of sufficient force to exert a prejudicial influence in producing the result arrived at by the trial court. We have examined these rulings, and are convinced from such examination that their effect was only to admit into the record relevant, competent, and peculiarly pertinent testimony under the theory of the action as we understand and have explained it.

The motion for a nonsuit was properly denied, and the judgment is affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; William P. Lawlor, Judge.

John Souleotes was convicted of committing a lewd and lascivious act with a child 13 years old, and from the judgment and from denial of a new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 146 Pac. 903.

Albert L. Johnson and F. J. Schuhl, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was informed against for committing a lewd and lascivious act with a child 13 years of age. He was found guilty, and sentenced to 15 years in the state prison. This appeal is taken from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The prosecutrix and the defendant lived on the same floor in a hotel on Third street in San Francisco. According to her testimony the defendant on December 20, 1913, at about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, came into the kitchen of a 3-room suite, in which she lived with her parents, and asked her to go outside in the hall with him. Arriving there, and while near the kitchen door and also near the door of his own room, he raised the child's clothes and committed the act complained of. Neither the father nor mother were present when the defendant invited the child to go into the hallway with him. She testified that while she resented the defendant's conduct she made no outcry because he asked her not to do so, and that she was not afraid of him. The hallway was dimly lighted. She did not report the incident to her parents, and never in fact told any one about it until about nine months later, when, upon request, she told the whole story to detectives of the San Francisco police department.

[1] While we are satisfied that the act charged did not occur exactly as narrated—in the daytime, in the hallway of a big hotel, between two rooms to which the defendant had access, and in either of which the act could have been performed with some security against discovery—and while we feel that the story told by the girl does contain certain elements of improbability, which were doubtless argued to and considered by the jury, still we are not prepared to say that the story as a whole is so inherently improbable as to require the setting aside of the verdict upon the ground that it must have been rendered under the influence of passion or prejudice.

[2] We find no error in the rulings of the court on the cross-examination of the mother of the prosecutrix. She was the only witness called for the defendant; and she testified on direct examination that her daughter had admitted to her, after the information against the defendant had been filed, that the defendant had never tampered with her. On cross-examination she denied that she was friendly with the defendant; but later, in answer to several questions over objection, she admitted that she was intimate with the defendant, and had had on a number of occasions sexual intercourse with him. Such questions were plainly proper as tending to show her interest in the defendant, and thereby affecting her credibility as a witness.

[3] The district attorney also asked the witness this question: "You are proud of it, are you? In other words, you also took sides with him when he was prosecuted for committing rape upon your other daughter?" The objection to this question was sustained; and as the asking of it was not assigned as misconduct, we are at a loss to understand how the defendant can be heard now to complain, even if it be conceded that the question was improper, which of course is not done.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

3. BURGLARY — VALUE OF PROPERTY TAKEN.

Where defendant had entered a lodging house room with intent to steal, he was guilty of burglary, whether or not the property taken was of sufficient value to make the taking a felony, since Pen. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

Ben Ferns was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

T. L. Christianson, of Oakland, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the first degree, and this appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The facts of the case pertinent to the decision of the points made in support of the appeal are substantially as follows: On the 2d day of February, 1914, the defendant occupied room 12 of a lodging house in Oakland kept by one Charles Fong. In the room were a number of articles, including a suit case, a small camera case, an overcoat, a pair of shoes, a steamboat ticket, and some milk bottle tickets. The defendant left the place at about 9 o'clock the next morning. At about 12 o'clock he reappeared, and asked Charles Fong if he might occupy the same room that night. Fong replied that he would be using the room in the evening until 12 o'clock, and that probably for this reason the defendant would not want it. To this the latter made no reply, and the two separated. Later the defendant went to the wife of Fong, and told her that her husband had rented the room to him; whereupon Mrs. Fong delivered to him the key of the room. The next morning the defendant was seen leaving this room, and going in the direction of the street carrying a dress suit case, and about 8 o'clock in the evening the articles enumerated above were missing. When arrested, milk bottle tickets were found in the possession of the defendant, which he claimed belonged to him.

[1, 2] It is urged on behalf of the appellant that a breaking is an essential element of burglary; that the evidence shows that the entry was lawful, and hence that there could be no breaking. But the defendant resorted to a subterfuge to get possession of the room; he was seen leaving the place under suspicious circumstances, and when arrested he had in his possession certain personal property belonging to the prosecuting witness and taken from the room occupied by the defendant. The jury was justified in inferring from this evidence that the defendant entered the room with the intention of committing larceny. Consequently, as to this element of the crime of burglary called in question by the appellant, the proof was sufficient. No matter what may be said of the character of his entry, as to whether or not it was lawful, if he entered the room for the purpose and with the intent to commit the crime of grand or petty larceny, a perfect case of burglary was established. Penal Code, § 459; People v. Barry, 94 Cal. 481, 29 Pac. 1026; People v. Brittain, 142 Cal. 8, 75 Pac. 314, 100 Am. St. Rep. 95. In the former case the court held that one who enters a store with the intention of committing larceny is guilty of burglary, although the entry was made through the public entrance during business hours. Such person is not one of the public invited, and he has no right of entry.

[3] There is no merit in the appellant's next contention that there was no evidence to show that the property taken was of sufficient value to make the taking thereof a felony, for the reason that the statute defining the offense provides that every person who enters a room with intent to commit grand or petty larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary.

[4] Equally without merit is the appellant's assertion that the milk checks were not sufficiently identified to warrant their admission in evidence. They were identified by the prosecuting witness as his property; and they, having been found on the person of the defendant at the time of his arrest, were admissible in evidence, not as being sufficient in themselves to warrant or sustain his conviction, but as a circumstance which it was proper to place before the jury for their consideration in passing upon the guilt or innocence of the defendant. People v. Lang, 142 Cal. 482, 76 Pac. 222.

[5] It is next urged by counsel for the appellant that, by compelling the defendant to stand up at the time of the trial for the purpose of being identified by a witness, defendant was obliged to be a witness against himself, contrary to article 1 of section 13 of the state Constitution. It is settled law in this state that an order of court compelling the defendant to stand up for identification by a witness is proper, and does not compel the defendant to become a witness against himself. People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161; People v. Oliveria, 127 Cal. 376, 380, 59 Pac. 772. There is therefore no merit in this contention of appellant.

There is no pretense that the appellant was not fully advised by the information as to the precise charge against him, and we have no doubt that the information sufficiently stated a public offense to support the judgment.

No error was committed by the trial court in its instructions to the jury.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by John Briles and wife against A. J. Paulson. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cornish & Robnett, of Alturas, for appellant. W. Lair Thompson, of Lakeview, Ore., and Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondents.

SLOSS, J. Appeal by defendant from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The case presents a situation very similar to that recently considered by this court in Briles v. Paulson, 149 Pac. 169. Thomas Briles had there sued for the annulment of a contract whereby the defendant's predecessor was given an option to purchase certain lands. One of the provisions of the contract was that the holder of the option should, within a given time, do certain work upon a reservoir dam. The contract provided that, if the proposed purchaser should fail to carry out any of the stipulations on his part, the owner might declare the agreement terminated. The action sought a judgment declaring such termination by reason of the alleged failure of the defendant to do the required work on the dam. The judgment forfeiting the defendant's rights under the option was affirmed, the court deciding that the evidence supported the findings that the work on the dam had not been done within the prescribed time, and holding, further, that such failure warranted the judgment declaring the agreement terminated. The same points are involved in the present action, and they, without regard to other grounds upon which the plaintiff herein sought relief, are sufficient for an affirmation of the judgment.

The contract which forms the basis of this suit was made on December 5, 1910, between John Briles and Irene Briles, his wife, as parties of the first part, and J. J. Payseur, as party of the second part. Paulson, the defendant and appellant, is the assignee and successor of Payseur. By the contract the parties of the first part granted the party of the second part "the option of purchasing for the sum of eighty thousand ($80,000) dollars, * * * at any time from the date of this agreement up to and until the thirty-first (31st) day of December, 1915, subject to the conditions herein contained," certain real estate situated in Modoc county. Provisions for the making of surveys and subdivisions and for the sale of subdivisions separately were made in terms similar to those contained in the contract between Thomas Briles and Payseur, involved in the former decision to which we have referred. The contract now before us refers to the dam on the land of Thomas Briles, and contains, with respect to that dam, the same stipulations found in the Thomas Briles contract. The subsequent modification of that stipulation mentioned in the former opinion covered the contract here involved as well as the contract between Thomas Briles and Payseur. The present contract also provides for the right of the parties of the first part to terminate the agreement and take possession of the property on the failure of the party of the second part to "carry out and perform each and every agreement herein contained to be performed by him."

In all the particulars to which we have adverted, the contract upon which this action is based is virtually the same as the Thomas Briles contract. The present contract contains, in addition, a provision that the defendant shall receive possession of the lands on March 1, 1911, and shall continue in possession "while this agreement remains in force," farming the lands and taking all products therefrom, paying as rental for the use of said property "while he remains thereon and in possession thereof under this agreement" an annual rental of $1,700. There is also a provision against the commission of waste by the party of the second part.

This action, like the one instituted by Thomas Briles, was brought to obtain a decree declaring the rights of the defendant under the agreement to be terminated for failure to perform the conditions undertaken to be performed by him. The plaintiffs also asked for the recovery of the possession of the premises. Judgment went in their favor as prayed.

The plaintiffs in their complaint counted upon three violations of the agreement by the defendant, to wit: The failure to pay the stipulated rent; the commission of waste; and failure to do the required work upon the dam within the time allowed by the agreement as modified. The court found in favor of the plaintiff upon all three grounds.

[1,2] It is unnecessary to consider the questions of waste and nonpayment of rent. The evidence fully sustains the finding that the work agreed to be done upon the dam was not done within the stipulated time. On this issue the evidence was substantially the same as that presented in the Thomas Briles Case, and it is therefore held here, as it was there, that there was a substantial conflict, and that the findings of the court below must be upheld. That the effect of such failure to perform the agreement relative to the dam authorized a termination of the contract is also settled by the decision in the former case. The agreement was plainly an option under which the defendant had a right to purchase upon compliance with certain conditions. Failing to comply with those conditions, his rights ended. It is argued that the agreement in this case is to be distinguished from the one considered in the other case because the present agreement gave the defendant a right to possession, subject to the payment of rent. The contention is that the present agreement is therefore not only an option, but also a lease. This argument implies that the defendant's rights as a defaulting tenant would be greater than his rights under an option to purchase. But, assuming the legal correctness of this position, it is quite clear, from a reading of the agreement as a whole, that its principal object is to grant to the defendant the right to purchase the lands. The right of possession is subordinate and incident to the right to purchase. The party of the second part is to have possession of the land only "while this agreement remains in force," and he is to pay rental while he remains in possession "under the agreement." Plainly it was not intended to create a tenancy which should exist independently of the right of the defendant to purchase under the option. When the right to purchase the land was gone, the right of occupancy went with it. This is the more apparent upon a consideration of the clause authorizing the plaintiffs to terminate the agreement upon any breach by the defendant. Under this clause the plaintiffs are expressly authorized, upon terminating the agreement, to enter upon and take possession of the lands.

The case is therefore in all material respects like that of Thomas Briles v. Paulson, and must be decided in the same way.

FRESNO CANAL & IRR. CO. v. PERRIN et al. (S. F. 6473.)

1. PLEADING 138—COUNTERCLAIM—STATUTE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 2, providing that a counterclaim must be one existing in favor of a defendant and against a plaintiff between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, in an action arising upon contract, any other cause of action arising also on contract and existing at the commencement of the action, where defendants, when sued by an irrigation company to recover for water furnished, filed a cross-complaint alleging that they owned the land, that there were certain water right agreements attached to such land as appurtenances, whereby the plaintiff had agreed to furnish for such land all necessary water, and that plaintiff, though requested to do so, had failed for eight years to furnish water, whereby the defendants were unable to raise any crops upon the land, although such pleading was denominated a cross-complaint, it was technically a counterclaim under the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. § 286; Dec. Dig.  138.]

2. PLEADING 195—COUNTERCLAIM—SUFFICIENCY.

Where plaintiff irrigation company sued to recover for water furnished defendants' land, and such defendants filed a cross-complaint alleging failure to furnish water, as plaintiff was obligated to do by contract, for eight years, such cross-complaint was not open to attack by demurrer, as failing to allege that defendants had performed all the conditions and the covenants of the contract; since the presumption could not be indulged, in support of the demurrer, that the agreement to furnish water mentioned in the cross-complaint was the same as that set forth in the complaint, or that there were mutual dependent covenants and conditions, the performance of which the defendants should have alleged in order to show that they were entitled to recover damages for the alleged breach by the plaintiff.

3. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞257—IRRIGATION CONTRACT—DEPENDENT COVENANTS—BREACH.

Where plaintiff irrigation company contracted to furnish water, and defendant landowners to pay for the same, the covenant of the plaintiff to furnish, and that of the defendants to make annual payments, being dependent, each annual payment being a condition precedent to the furnishing of water, where plaintiff did not avail itself of its right to terminate the contract for default in payment of 30 days, but continued to recognize the contract and to deliver some water in pursuance thereof, such conduct of the plaintiff operated as a waiver of its right to terminate the contract for defendants' failure to pay annual installments, so far as concerned the rights of the defendants to demand and receive water thereafter, and to claim damages for the failure of the plaintiff to furnish it.

4. CONTRACTS ☞173—IRRIGATION CONTRACT—INDEPENDENT COVENANTS—BREACH—EFFECT.

Where the contract of plaintiff irrigation company was to furnish water, when ordered, continuously from February 19, 1897, to February 16, 1921, while defendant landowners promised to make annual payments therefor, the covenants of the parties were not dependent or concurrent, since, where covenants are to be performed at different times, they are independent, and breach by one party does not relieve the other of his duty of performance, so that, for failure of the defendants to make payments, the plaintiff, itself in default in furnishing water, could only claim the right to recover the payments due it, and to have the amount thereof set off against damage to the defendants from its own failure to deliver water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 762-764; Dec. Dig. ☞173.]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞263—IRRIGATION CONTRACT—BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

For breach of a contract to furnish water for purposes of irrigation, the measure of damages, where there has been total failure to deliver as contracted for, is the difference between the rental value of the land with water, and its value without it, less the lawful price of the water.

6. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞263—IRRIGATION CONTRACT—DAMAGES—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against an irrigation company for failure to furnish water to defendants' lands, evidence as to the extent of lands left unirrigated held sufficient to support verdict, under the proper measure of damages, for $500 above the $3,193.75 owed the irrigation company for water furnished.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 324; Dec. Dig. ☞263.]

7. WATERS AND WATER COURSES ☞263—IRRIGATION CONTRACT—BREACH—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where all the land contracted to be furnished with water by an irrigation company is supplied with some water during a substantial part of the year, the rule of damages that, for total failure to deliver water, the measure of damages is the difference between the rental value of the land with water and its value without it, less the price of the water, has no application, and evidence is inadmissible to show comparative rental value; but, where there was evidence that a large portion of the land was left without any water, such evidence was properly allowed.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company against Lilo M. Perrin and E. B. Perrin. Judgment for defendants on their cross-complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. H. Short and F. E. Cook, both of Fresno, for appellant. L. L. Cory, of Fresno, and G. W. Cartwright, of Sacramento, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of the defendants and also from an order denying its motion for a new trial. The judgment further provided that the defendant Lilo M. Perrin should recover of plaintiff the sum of $500.

The plaintiff's complaint contained four counts for the recovery of annual payments, amounting in the aggregate to $3,193.75, upon four separate water right contracts executed by the plaintiff, all dated February 19, 1897, in each of which plaintiff agreed to furnish water from its canal for the irrigation of certain tracts of land belonging to the defendant Lilo M. Perrin, from the date thereof until February 16, 1921. Each contract provided that the annual payments due thereon for water furnished should constitute a lien upon the land. They were of the same form as the contracts which were held to create a lien upon the land by the decisions in Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Rowell, 80 Cal. 114, 22 Pac. 53, 13 Am. St. Rep. 112, and Fresno Canal & Irrigation Co. v. Dunbar, 80 Cal. 530, 22 Pac. 275. The complaint asked for a foreclosure of this lien and the sale of the respective tracts of land to satisfy the amounts due. The answer admitted that the defendants had not made the annual payments sued for. The defense was that the plaintiff had not performed the covenants required to be performed by it, and that, in consequence of plaintiff's failure, there was no sum of money due or payable by the defendants to the plaintiff under said contracts.

[1] The defendants also filed a cross-complaint alleging that Lilo M. Perrin was the owner of the lands in controversy, that there were certain water right agreements attached to said lands as appurtenances thereto, whereby the plaintiff had agreed to furnish for said land all water that might be required for the irrigation thereof, that without the use of the water the lands were worthless for the purpose of raising crops thereon, that the plaintiff, although requested so to do, had failed and refused to furnish any water for or upon said lands during the years from 1897 to 1904, inclusive, by reason whereof said defendant Lilo M. Perrin was unable to raise any crops of any kind upon the land, to her damage in the sum of $20,000. E. B. Perrin is the husband of Lilo M. Perrin. Although this pleading is named a cross-complaint, it is a cause of action arising upon contract for the recovery of money and existing at the commencement of plaintiff's action, and it is therefore technically a "counterclaim" as defined in subdivision 2 of section 438 of the Code of Civil Procedure. There is no allegation showing that it arose out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as a foundation for the plaintiff's claim, or that it was connected with the subject of the action of the plaintiff. There is nothing to show that the agreements referred to are the same agreements as those upon which the cause of action is founded. Consequently it does not, upon its face, show that it is a counterclaim within the first subdivision of the aforesaid section.

A jury was called to try the case. A verdict was returned in favor of the defendant Lilo M. Perrin for the sum of $500, and judgment was rendered accordingly.

[2] The first point urged in support of the appeals is that the so-called cross-complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. A demurrer thereto, based on that ground, was overruled. The plaintiff claims that it was necessary for the defendant to allege that she had performed all the conditions and covenants of the contract which it required of her. In support of this proposition, plaintiff assumes that the water right agreements mentioned in said cross-complaint are the same as those set forth in the complaint, and that there were mutual dependent covenants and conditions therein, the performance of which the defendant should have alleged in order to show that she was entitled to recover damages for the alleged breach of covenants by the plaintiff. This presumption cannot be indulged in support of the demurrer. The sufficiency of the cross-complaint or counterclaim must be determined wholly from its own allegations. It purports to state the contracts sued on according to their legal effect, and it contains nothing to show that there are any covenants or conditions therein other than those of the plaintiff to furnish water. So far as appears therefrom, there was no obligation in said contract except that of the plaintiff to furnish water for the lands owned by the said defendant. This being the case, there was no occasion for an allegation that said defendant had kept and performed the covenants of the contract. That question would arise only when, upon the proof, it appeared that there were dependent conditions which said defendant must perform, prior to or concurrent with her right to demand performance by the plaintiff. The demurrer was properly overruled.

[3] Upon the trial it appeared that the agreements upon which the counterclaim was predicated were the same as those mentioned in the complaint. The plaintiff contends that the admitted fact that the defendant has failed to make the annual payments thereon precludes her from relief by way of damages for the alleged failure of plaintiff to furnish water as the agreement required. By the terms of the agreements, the annual payments were to be made on the first Monday of September of each year and, in case of default thereon for 30 days, the plaintiff, at its option, might terminate the agreement. The evidence shows that the plaintiff did not avail itself of this option, but that, on the contrary, it treated the agreements as still in force and continued thereafter to deliver some water in pursuance thereof, as before, and to recognize the contracts as obligatory upon itself. It claimed that it had delivered all the water demanded. If it were conceded that the covenant of the plaintiff to furnish water and that of the defendant to make the annual payments were dependent, or that the annual payment was a condition precedent to the furnishing of the water, we think this conduct of the plaintiff would operate as a waiver of its rights to terminate or avoid the contract for failure to pay the annual installments, so far as it affected the right of the defendant to demand and receive water thereafter and to claim damages for the failure of the plaintiff to furnish it. Los Angeles, etc., Corp. v. Amal. Oil Co., 168 Cal. 143, 142 Pac. 46; Cincinnati, etc., Co. v. Baker, 130 Ill. App. 416.

[4] But the covenants are not dependent or concurrent. The water was to be furnished, when wanted, continuously from February 19, 1897, to February 16, 1921, while the payments were to be made annually as aforesaid. The furnishing of the water for the first six months could not be dependent upon or concurrent with the payment to be made in the following September. The same would be true of each succeeding year, upon the plaintiff's election not to terminate the agreements by reason of the failure of the defendant to pay. Where the covenants of the respective parties are to be performed at different times they are held to be independent and the breach by one party of his covenant does not excuse the performance by the other of his covenant or relieve him of liability for damages for a breach thereof. S. P. R. R. Co. v. Allen, 112 Cal. 461, 44 Pac. 796; Front St. M. & O. R. R. Co. v. Butler, 50 Cal. 577; Bank of Woodland v. Duncan, 117 Cal. 412, 49 Pac. 414; Deacon v. Blodget, 111 Cal. 418, 44

Pac. 159. Upon these facts, the most that the plaintiff can claim on account of the failure of the defendant to make the payments is the right to recover the same and to have the amount thereof set off pro tanto against such damage as the defendant has shown from the failure of the plaintiff to deliver water.

[5, 6] The only evidence offered regarding the measure of damages was proof of the annual rental values of the lands with water for irrigation and of the rental values without water. The measure of damages in such cases, where there has been total failure to deliver water as contracted for, "is the difference between the rental value of the land with water and its value without it, and the lawful price of the water should also be taken into consideration and deducted." Crow v. San Joaquin, 130 Cal. 314, 62 Pac. 562, 1058; Pallett v. Murphy, 131 Cal. 197, 63 Pac. 366. The court upon this subject instructed the jury as follows:

"It appears in the evidence, without dispute, that certain waters were during each year supplied by the plaintiff to the defendants under contracts for use upon said lands, and that the defendants either used or had the opportunity to use the same. Therefore the defendants cannot recover on their cross-complaint upon the basis of the difference that would have resulted from an entire absence of water for the irrigation of said lands, but only, if at all, for such detriment as is shown by the evidence to have actually resulted from the failure of the plaintiffs to supply water in compliance with the said contracts."

The evidence supports the statement in the first sentence of this quotation. Upon that the plaintiff contends that inasmuch as there were no facts proven upon which to estimate damages, except the difference between the rental value in the case of the entire absence of water and such rental value where the full supply was furnished in accordance with the contracts, the jury had no basis upon which they could calculate the damages, and therefore that the verdict allowing $500 to the defendant as damages, over and above the $3,193.75 due for the annual payments, was without support in the evidence. Upon an analysis of the evidence, however, we find it sufficient to show that, although some water was delivered and used each year, yet that each year parts of defendant's lands, amounting to 500 or 600 acres in some years, were left without any water for the entire year. Testimony was given to the effect that there was never water sufficient to irrigate more than about 320 acres of the 1,000 acres of the defendant's land which the plaintiff had agreed to supply with water. It is true that the evidence as to the land supplied with water was somewhat confusing and conflicting but it was for the jury to resolve the conflicts and uncertainties and estimate the area that was left without any supply. If the jury found, as they might have done from the evidence, that even one-third of the

1,000 acres of land to be supplied was left without water because of the failure of the plaintiff to furnish it, when it had water available, there would be sufficient basis, upon the measure of damages given, to support the verdict.

[7] The plaintiff objected to the introduction of evidence of comparative rental values, with and without water, basing his objections on the ground that the rule of damages referred to above has no application where the water supply is not entirely withheld. If the evidence showed that all the land was supplied with some water during a substantial part of each year, this contention would be meritorious. But, as there was evidence from which the jury might have concluded that a large portion of the land of the defendant was left without any water for each of the five years to which the jury were confined by the instructions of the court in estimating the damage suffered by her, the evidence was properly allowed.

No other points are advanced in support of the appeals.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS $\Leftarrow$ 194—FAMILY ALLOWANCES — DISCRETION OF COURT.

Where a testator left an estate valued at approximately a million, a family allowance of $1,000 a month made to the widow after inventory cannot be held an abuse of the probate court's discretion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ernest W. Cowell, deceased. Petition by Alice M. Cowell against Alexander F. Morrison and another, as executor and executrix, opposed by S. H. Cowell and others. From an order granting plaintiff a family allowance, the opponents appeal. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellants. J. F. Shuman, W. I. Brobeck, and P. F. Dunne, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order granting a family allowance of $1,000 a month to the respondent, Alice M. Cowell, widow of the deceased, made by the court after the return of an inventory showing the estate to be valued at $972,992.44.

The only point made on this appeal is that the allowance was excessive, and hence there was an abuse of discretion on the part of the superior court in making it.

This is the second appeal taken by appellants from an order for a family allowance in favor of the widow of deceased. Before the return of the inventory in the estate the superior court made an order granting a family allowance to the widow of $1,500 a month from the date of the death of the testator until an inventory in the estate should be returned. An appeal from that order was taken to this court, one of the grounds urged for a reversal being that the allowance was excessive. Estate of Cowell, 164 Cal. 637, 130 Pac. 209. We held on that appeal, and as to that matter, that the fixing of an allowance reasonably necessary for the support of the widow out of the estate of her deceased husband was a matter largely left to the discretion of the judge in probate, and that, in view of the circumstances and condition of this estate and the reasonable wants and necessities of the widow as disclosed by the evidence presented in support of the order, this court could not say that any abuse of discretion on the part of the trial court was shown in making the allowance it did and therefore affirmed the order.

The present order for $1,000 a month made after the return of the inventory, and to be paid pending the settlement of the estate, is for $500 less than the previous order. There is practically no difference between the evidence offered and contained in the record on appeal in the present case than was presented in the former one, and as, in view of the evidence presented on the former appeal, we could not say that within the wide discretion given to the trial judge in the matter of a family allowance there had been any abuse of it in allowing the widow $1,500 a month, so we cannot say that this discretion was abused in making the allowance of $1,000 a month questioned on this appeal.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Where a testator made bequests to all employés of a concern in which he was interested who had been in its employ for ten years, the date to be as of January 1, 1911, the bequests cannot, in view of the testator's knowledge that the men did not work on January 1st, be deemed payable only on condition that they were engaged on that day.

3. WILLS ⚡503—CONSTRUCTION—EMPLOYMENT.

A testator bequeathed a legacy to each employé of a company who had been in its service for ten years, the date to be as of January 1, 1911. The company engaged kiln laborers, paying them by the month, but without making any formal contracts and discharging them at its pleasure. A laborer who had been in the company's service for over ten years was paid off on December 31st. The kiln was not in operation on January 1, 1911, and owing to wet weather was not operated for some time thereafter. When operated the laborer went back to work. Held, that he was entitled to the legacy; it appearing that, while there was no formal contract, the laborers without any new orders took up their old duties after the end of each month.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Ernest W. Cowell, deceased. Petition by F. A. Berio, as administrator of the estate of Frank Tralago, known also as Frank T. Traolo, deceased, substituted in place of his intestate, for partial distribution opposed by S. H. Cowell and others. From an order granting the petition, the opponents appeal. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellants. I. F. Chapman, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order made in the above estate granting the application of Frank Tralago for a partial distribution.

The will of said E. W. Cowell, deceased, among other provisions, contained the following:

"Fifth. To all employés of the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company now working for said firm as Santa Cruz and who have been in said employ for twenty years, the sum of one thousand dollars each, and to all who have worked over ten years, the sum of five hundred dollars each. * * * In all cases these dates are as of January 1st, 1911."

Frank Tralago filed a petition in said estate for partial distribution to him of $1,000 under the above provision of the will of deceased, alleging that he was an employé of the said company and worked for it at Santa Cruz for more than 20 years prior to the 1st day of January, 1911, and was so employed upon said 1st day of January, 1911. The court found that the petitioner was an employé and worked for the company at Santa Cruz for more than 10 years prior to the 1st day of January, 1911, and was so employed on the 1st day of January, 1911, and ordered a distribution to him of $500 as coming within the clause of said will relating to 10-year employés.

There is no question but that Frank Tralago had worked for the company at Santa Cruz for more than 10 years prior to January 1, 1911, and up to that date. The point made on this appeal is that he was not in the employment of or working for the said company on January 1, 1911. There were but three witnesses who testified on the hearing, and their condensed testimony as contained in the record is not as clear and definite upon matters which were involved in and being considered on the hearing as it might have been made. The petitioner, an unmarried man, testified that he had started to work for the company in 1884, quitting work for it, as he stated, "at the end of December last year." As the hearing in this matter was held in 1913, this reference of the witness to "December last year" meant December, 1912. Continuing, he testified that he worked for the company all the time from 1884 until last year (1912) with the exception of a few years; that he was working up to the 1st of January, 1911, and was working for the company when the testator died in March, 1911. A fellow workman with petitioner for the company testified, among other things, that petitioner was working for the company in January, 1911, and up to the time the witness quit working for it in June, 1911. The only other witness—the manager of the company—testified to data from the time books of the company kept by its foremen while petitioner worked for the company, showing he had worked for it for more than 10 years. It does not appear plainly in what branch of work the petitioner was employed, although it is fairly inferable from the testimony that he was doing kiln work. Further, the manager stated that petitioner was in the employment of the company during December, 1910, but that his name did not appear on the pay roll of the company as being employed by it in January, 1911; that the first of the year being a holiday every man took a rest; that on the 31st of December every man was given his time up to then; that Tralago was not hired any longer; that the kiln could not be worked in the rain; that petitioner worked 23 days in December, 1911; that he quit at that time and went somewhere for a holiday and did not return to work for the company again, as far as the pay roll indicated, until February, 1911; that the company had no contract with a man employed by it; that it employed one any day it wanted and discharged him any time it desired to do so; that the men were all paid a specified rate per day for all days of actual work in a month based on a fixed amount as monthly wages and were paid off at the end of every month; that the kiln men lived at the kiln and were boarded by the company.

[1] This was all the evidence in the case, and the claim of appellants is that it shows petitioner was neither working for nor an employé of the company on January 1, 1911, so as to bring him within the terms of the testamentary clause. It is, of course, conceded that the petitioner was not actually working for the company on the 1st day of January, 1911. Under the evidence, its employés were not expected to, nor did they, work on the 1st day of the year. But it was obviously not the intention of the testator that in order to be the recipient of his bounty that an employé, in addition to showing that he had worked for the period of years required, should show in addition that he was actually working on the 1st day of January, 1911. The testator, it is to be assumed, knew that by reason of the first of the year being a holiday the employés of the company would not be actually working on that day. The intention of the testator was to reward such employés as had served the company in which he was largely interested for specified long periods of service and who were still with it on January 1, 1911. This latter requirement only applied to employment with the company on that day. If this were not so, then there must be ascribed to the testator according to the construction claimed by appellants an intention to defeat his main purpose of rewarding employés for long service by prescribing in addition to such service that they should be actually working on a day when he must have known by the custom of the company and the character of the day as a generally observed holiday the employés would not be doing so.

[2, 3] Nor do we think that it can be said under the evidence that petitioner was not in the employment of the company on the 1st day of January, 1911. He had worked up to that date and was paid off with the other employés, as it was its custom so to do at the end of every month. Of course, his further employment ended then if the company saw fit to so consider it. It was not required to take him on again unless it wished to do so. But it cannot be said that he was fully discharged as an employé. It appears that the custom of the company was to pay off the men at the end of each month. This payment then was not considered by the company as a discharge from employment of such employés, nor so considered by the men. The latter resumed work each following month without any formal engagement by the company. Their employment was treated as a continuous employment which mere payment by the month did not affect. It is true that the petitioner was paid off with the other men on the last of December, 1910; but this transaction, it is apparent, was not intended as a discharge of the men from any further employment or connection with the work of the company. It was merely a temporary cessation of work in the kilns on account of rain and, as the manager puts it, petitioner went away for a holiday, returning in January (as in the conflict of the evidence on this point we must assume to be true), and resumed his work for the company. It was evidently not the intention of the company to discharge the petitioner as one of its old employés, nor the intention of the petitioner to abandon his employment with it. There was simply a temporary suspension of the particular work of the company in which petitioner had been engaged and a temporary laying-off of the men engaged therein, including petitioner, until work should be resumed. While, strictly speaking, the petitioner was not in the employment of the company during the period from December 31, 1910, to some time in January following—that is, not actually working for it on January 1, 1911—still, in a qualified sense, we think he was in such employment on that date. His connection with the company had not been completely severed by a discharge. He had only been temporarily laid off awaiting the resumption of the work in which he had theretofore been employed and apparently with the tacit understanding that he should resume work with the company when it was ready to resume it.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by the Lincoln County Bank against George C. Fetterman. From a judgment for plaintiff and order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

F. E. Davis and H. C. Millsap, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Thomas A. Sanson, Duke Stone, and Phil Cass, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought against R. J. Pace, J. W. Pace, and Sid Pace upon their promissory note for $3,500 in favor of defendant, George C. Fetterman. The complaint charged the execution of the note by the Paces to Fetterman and his indorsement of the note over to the plaintiff before maturity. It pleaded:

"That demand has been made by plaintiff upon the said defendants and each of them, for the payment of the amount due upon the said promissory note; that there has been paid plaintiff upon the principal sum of said note the sum of $1,526.65, and the interest thereon has been paid up to and including the 20th day of June, 1911, leaving due and owing thereon to plaintiff from defendants the sum of $1,973.35, with interest thereon at the rate of 1 per cent. per month from the 20th day of June, A. D. 1911, until paid, and which amount the said defendants and each of them refuse and neglect to pay to plaintiff, although oft requested so to do."

Plaintiff is a Nevada corporation, and the note was executed in the state of Nevada. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from that judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

Under the answer filed to this complaint, the cause came on for trial. At the time of the trial defendant offered the following amendment:

"This defendant is informed and believes, and upon such information and belief alleges, the fact to be that plaintiff is doing business in this state, and there has never been filed in the office of the secretary of state of the state of California a designation by the plaintiff of some person residing within the state of California upon whom process issued by authority of or under any law of this state may be served; and there has never been filed in the office of the secretary of state of the state of California a certified copy of plaintiff's articles of incorporation, if any there are, or of its charter, if any, it has, or of the statute or statutes, or legislative, or executive, or governmental act or acts creating it, if any there are, duly certified by the secretary of state, or other officer authorized by the law of the jurisdiction under which such corporation is formed, if formed at all, to certify such copy; and there has never been filed a certified copy thereof, duly certified by the secretary of this state, in the office of the county clerk of the county where its principal place of business is located, and also where such corporation owns property."

[1] The court refused defendant leave to file this amendment. It was not an abuse of discretion. The action was a simple action by a Nevada corporation upon a promissory note executed in Nevada against a defendant found in California. Without regard to the legality of the prohibition of section 410 of the Civil Code upon foreign corporations from maintaining actions in any of the courts of this state, it is sufficient to say that the amendment here offered was properly refused. It bears evidence upon its face that it is sham. It is not even alleged that plaintiff was doing business in the state before or at the time of the commencement of this action. The amendment alleges merely that defendant is informed and believes that plaintiff is now doing business in this state. The denial upon information and belief that the plaintiff corporation has complied with the law is insufficient. Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 Pac. 144; Zany v. Mining Co., 15 Cal. App. 295, 114 Pac. 1026.

[2] Upon the trial of the case, when plaintiff sought to introduce its evidence, defendant objected upon the ground that the complaint failed distinctly to aver nonpayment. It would appear from the paragraph quoted that even under the very strict rule adhered to in this state and expressed in Barney v. Vigoreaux, 92 Cal. 631, 28 Pac. 678, Ryan v. Halliday, 110 Cal. 335, 42 Pac. 891, Richards v. Lake View, 115 Cal. 642, 47 Pac. 683, Hurley v. Ryan, 119 Cal. 71, 51 Pac. 20, and Knox v. Buckman, 139 Cal. 598, 73 Pac. 428, there was a sufficient pleading of nonpayment to pass a general demurrer.

[3] As a matter of precaution, however, plaintiff sought and obtained leave to amend by adding to his complaint this language: "Which amount is due and remains wholly unpaid." Upon the court granting leave to plaintiff so to amend, defendant's counsel moved the court for a continuance that he might plead to this amended complaint, stating that "he is not prepared to plead and meet the new issue raised at this time." The court denied this motion, and its action in this regard constitutes the gravamen of the complaint upon this appeal.

Appellant's complaint in this matter is founded upon his assertion of an absolute right to plead anew to the complaint because it was amended. He founds this right upon section 432 of the Code of Civil Procedure and upon the general rule as stated in the cases (see French v. Stewart, 22 Wall. 238, 22 L. Ed. 854) that an amendment of a bill gives a defendant a right to answer as if he had not answered before. He relies still further upon our own decisions. Elder v. Spinks, 53 Cal. 294; Morton v. Bartning, 68 Cal. 306, 9 Pac. 146; Chamberlain v. Loewenthal, 138 Cal. 50, 70 Pac. 932. The rule governing the right to plead to an amended complaint is not as broad as appellant would have it. Nor yet is it so broad as is implied in Morton v. Bartning, supra.

Section 432 of our Code of Civil Procedure, in declaring that the amendments, or the complaint as amended, must be answered by the defendant within ten days, or such other time as the court may direct, is but a direction to compel the joining of issues within a reasonable time, so as to expedite the trial of actions. It still rests within the sound discretion of the court as to whether any time shall be allowed to the defendant to answer, and whether or not time will be allowed will depend upon the nature and character of the amendment to the complaint. It states the rule too broadly, therefore, to say that because a complaint is amended, even in most trivial and unimportant particulars, the defendant has the absolute right to time and to the postponement of the case to plead to this amendment. The underlying proposition to be decided upon the facts of each case where the court has refused to allow time to the defendant or to allow an amendment is whether or not the court's discretion was abused and the defendant injured thereby. In the present case all that the plaintiff asked leave to do and did was to make more specific an allegation of nonpayment of a promissory note, which allegation was certainly sufficient to pass a general demurrer. It could not have taken defendant by surprise to have had this allegation of nonpayment made more specific. It could not have introduced any new element in the case which he was not prepared to meet. It could not have necessitated the procurement by him of witnesses or evidence which should not have been at hand. Defendant was not surprised. He does not here assert that he was surprised, but asserts merely that he had the right to time and to file a new pleading. But to this respondent makes further answer that the issue of nonpayment had been joined by the answer on file, which answer in terms pleaded payment. This plea of payment, coupled with the allegation of the complaint, presented the issue of payment or nonpayment, and cured whatever defect in this regard may have lain in the complaint. This being so, then the amendment raised no new issue and presented no new proposition which the defendant was called upon to meet, and the court was absolutely justified in refusing leave to the defendant to amend.

[4] But appellant has not seen fit to bring up his original answer, standing upon the mistaken technicality that, because the court allowed the plaintiff to amend in this trifling particular, his answer became functus officio, was absolutely superseded, was as though it had never been filed, and formed no part of the judgment roll. This appeal presents propositions of a narrow and technical nature, supported by no showing or offer to show hardship or injury. It may well be met, therefore, by the technical, but eminently sound, response which respondent makes, that the judgment roll presented by the appellant is radically defective in failing to present the answer upon which the case was actually tried, and in presenting as a substitute an answer which the court refused to allow the defendant to file. The original answer was not only not eliminated by virtue of the amendment to the complaint, but was the answer joining the issues upon which the action was tried. It was an essential part of the judgment roll. Redington v. Cornwell, 90 Cal. 60, 27 Pac. 40.

[5] Still further appellant's notice of intention to move for a new trial has not been authenticated and brought before this court by any statement or bill of exceptions. The mere fact that it may have been printed in the transcript without proper authentication will not authorize this court to consider it. Pico v. Cohen, 78 Cal. 384, 20 Pac. 706; Paige v. Roeding, 96 Cal. 390, 31 Pac. 264; Skinner v. Horn, 146 Cal. 63, 79 Pac. 597; Muzzy v. McEwen Lumber Co., 154 Cal. 686, 98 Pac. 1062. In the absence of proper authentication there is presented no record upon the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial which can here be properly reviewed. Willow Land Co. v. Goldschmidt, 11 Cal. App. 297, 104 Pac. 841.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

HORTON v. REMILLARD BRICK CO.
(S. F. 6420.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1915.
Rehearing Denied July 8, 1915.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨70—COMPENSATION—NET PROFITS AND BONUS—TIME OF COMPUTATION.

Under a 10-year contract entered into in December, 1906, whereby plaintiff became the manager of the defendant company at a monthly salary, and in addition was to receive a bonus of $1,200 upon the yearly profits equaling 12 per cent. of the defendant company's invested capital and $600 for each additional 1 per cent. profit, the bonus, if any, was not postponed until the end of 10 years, nor based upon a full account of profits and losses at the end of such period, but was to be allowed upon the net profits as ascertained annually, even though the contract was entire in respect to the term of service.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 82-86; Dec. Dig. ⇨70.]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨80—NET PROFITS AND BONUS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—DEPRECIATION.

In an action to recover a certain share of the net profits earned by defendant in its business for 1907, based upon a written contract employing plaintiff from December, 1906, for a 10-year term at a monthly salary, and in addition a bonus of $1,200 on profits equaling 12 per cent. of the company's invested capital, and $600 for each additional 1 per cent. profit, evidence held not to show that there was any agreement as to the method of making inventories, or any custom as to depreciating inventories which the court should have found had become a part of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-127; Dec. Dig. ⇨80.]

3. EVIDENCE ⇨354—ADMISSIONS—TRIAL BALANCE.

In such action certain exhibits, as "Profits and Loss Sheet," "Surplus Sheet," "Assets and Liability Account of '07," and "Surplus Account" were properly admitted on the theory that they constituted at least prima facie admissions by defendant as to the amount of the profits of its business upon the closing of its books for 1907.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1432-1483; Dec. Dig. ⇨354.]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT ⇨80—COMPENSATION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—AMOUNT OF NET PROFITS.

In an action to recover a certain share of the net profits earned by defendant company in its business for a certain year, based upon a written contract employing plaintiff as manager for that year, evidence held to sustain finding that the net profits for that year were $74,806.09, being over 18 per cent. on a capital stock of $408,167.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 107-127; Dec. Dig. ⇨80.]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR ⇨1056—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—ACTION FOR SHARE OF NET PROFITS—EVIDENCE.

In such action, where all the facts were before the court and it was its duty to decide the issues, the sustaining of an objection to questions to an expert witness as to his opinion upon the correctness of the statement of profits, was not prejudicial to the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4187-4193, 4207; Dec. Dig. ⇨1056.]

6. CONTRACTS ⇨349—ACTION FOR SHARE OF PROFITS—EVIDENCE.

In such action, where the issue was as to the amount of profits shown at the end of the year 1907, evidence as to the selling price of the company's products for 1908 was immaterial.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Edward H. Horton against the Remillard Brick Company. Judgment for plaintiff, motion for new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for appellant. Wright & Wright & Stetson, of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Upon consideration of the petition for the hearing of this cause before this court, after decision in the District Court of Appeal, this court, while well satisfied with the soundness of the reasoning and conclusions reached by the Court of Appeal, in all other respects, considered one question of sufficient gravity to justify further consideration of it here. That question was whether, under the terms of the contract between Horton and the defendant, the profits were to be the actual profits, or whether by convention and agreement it was understood that the profits should be estimated profits. The point becomes one of great importance in the case because it was shown that, while in the statement estimating the profits the bricks of defendant carried over into the year 1908 were appraised at cost, they were, owing to business depression, sold for much less than cost in 1908. We are, however, convinced that the Court of Appeal was right in the conclusion it reached upon this question, and that under their contract the parties agreed to an annual estimate of profits as the basis of plaintiff's claim for compensation. The opinion and decision of the District Court of Appeal is therefore adopted as the opinion and decision of this court, and the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed. The opinion and decision is as follows:

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action to recover a certain share of the net profits earned by defendant in its business for the year 1907, and is based upon a written contract between plaintiff and defendant bearing date December 14, 1906. The essential part of this contract reads as follows: "The party of the second part agrees to enter the employment of the first party and to continue such employment until the 14th day of December, 1916, he to discharge such duties as may reasonably be required of him by the directors of first party; second party agrees during the said period to devote his time during business hours, his best abilities and energies to the business interests of the first party; first party hereby agrees to employ second party for said period and as compensation for such services to be so rendered first party promises to pay to second party a monthly salary, same to be at the rate of three hundred dollars per month, from date hereof to the 1st day of January, 1907, and thereafter at the rate of five hundred dollars per month, same to be paid at the end of each current month, first party further agrees in addition to the monthly salary as hereinbefore specified to pay to second party for further compensation for such services a bonus upon the yearly profits, if any, of the business of the first party, after December 31st, 1906, that is to say, if commencing January 1st, 1907, the annual net profits on the capital invested in the business of party of the first part equals twelve per cent., party of the first part agrees to forthwith pay unto party of the second part a bonus of twelve hundred dollars, and if such annual profits exceed said twelve per cent., then the bonus to be paid by first party to second party shall in addition to said twelve hundred dollars be the sum of six hundred dollars for each additional one per cent. profit above said twelve per cent. It being understood and agreed that as a basis for the estimation of said profits the capital invested in the said business shall be taken at the sum of four hundred and eight thousand one hundred and sixty-seven dollars in accordance with inventory as shown by the closing of the books of said business December 31st, 1905."

The cause was tried by the court without a jury and judgment passed for plaintiff for the sum of $4,800, with interest from January 1, 1908. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial.

The court found that, for the period commencing January 1, 1907, and ending December 31, 1907, "the defendant's annual net profits on the business transacted during that period, based on the capital invested in its said business, to wit, the sum of $408,167, amounted to the sum of $74,806.09, being over 18 per cent. upon the amount of such capital," and by reason thereof there became due plaintiff, on January 1, 1908, the sum of $4,800 "as a bonus upon said yearly profits for the year 1907," for which the aforesaid judgment was given. It seems not to be disputed that plaintiff's bonus amounted to the sum awarded him if the court was justified in finding that the net profits of defendant's business for 1907 were correctly arrived at.

Some errors are assigned arising out of rulings of the court in receiving and refusing evidence but the principal errors complained of relate: First, to the construction placed upon the contract by the trial court; and, second, to the method adopted in making up the inventory of defendant's property for 1907 and its influence upon the profit and loss account.

It is contended by defendant that "the contract was entire—if profits of one year were offset by losses of other years intervening before suit on the contract, plaintiff could not recover."

As to the inventory for 1907 the claim is that it made no allowance for depreciation; "that the proven business custom of making annual allowance for depreciation of plant and equipment was the law of Horton's contract and regulates his rights."

We find these two objections at the threshold of the discussion. If the trial court was wrong in disregarding the results of the business for subsequent years up to the time plaintiff ceased to be employed under the contract, prejudicial error is shown, because had the net profits of 1908 and 1909 been considered together with those of 1907, the combined result would not have warranted the judgment.

Upon the second proposition, the net profits for 1907 depended largely upon the integrity of the inventory for that year, and unless it was unassailable, the profit and loss account would lack a proper or correct basis.

Defendant became incorporated in December, 1879, the business having been carried on previously by Remillard Bros. the owners of four-fifths of the stock in defendant at its incorporation. The capital at this time, as shown by the articles, was $200,000, which had increased, when the 1905 inventory was taken, to $408,167. The company owned considerable real estate at different points where its brickyards were located and elsewhere, some farming land and some city land in Oakland and Alameda, besides the equipment for three large brickyards and their kilns. It was engaged chiefly in manufacturing brick and dealt also in lime, plaster, and cement, and carried on some farming in a small way. In part its operating property consisted of wagons, horses, harness, steam propelled schooners, steam engines, and boilers, electric motors, locomotives, brick molds, brick machines, steam pumps, dump carts, kilns, blacksmith shops and equipment, numerous tools, railroad tracks and cars, and many other articles used in the business. The buildings used were many and of considerable value. Without further enumeration the foregoing will indicate the character of the property entering into the inventory.

On August 9, 1906, an executive committee consisting of three directors was created, "with full authority to have charge of all details as of the company business, and making any and all alterations, changes, and improvements in detail as to the systems or methods, etc., in their judgment desirable." This was about one month after Horton had entered defendant's employment. He had been chosen as one of the directors and he, with Messrs. Metcalf and Gelinas, were made the members of this executive committee. On December 13, 1906, by consent of more than two-thirds of the stockholders, among them Cordule Remillard, 1,020 shares; Charles Simard, 30 shares; J. P. Gelinas, 5 shares; E. H. Horton (plaintiff), 40 shares; Lamoureux estate, 200 shares; George D. Metcalf, 5 shares; P. H. Simard estate, 100 shares; and Maria Biltz, 50 shares—the by-laws of the corporation were amended. The amendments provided that “the board of directors shall, when in their judgment it is to the interest of the corporation so to do, have power to enter into a contract of employment with any of its agents, superintendents, managers, or other employes, for a definite period not exceeding ten years, provided that before such contract shall become binding upon the corporation, it shall be ratified at a duly convened meeting of the stockholders.” Plaintiff was at this time a director. The contract involved in the action was made 11 days later (December 14, 1906), and was signed for the corporation by Geo. D. Metcalf, president, J. P. Gelinas, secretary, and by E. H. Horton in his own behalf. The validity of the contract is not disputed, and there is no evidence that in its making the company was overreached or deceived by plaintiff in any way. At the meeting of the stockholders February 4, 1907, plaintiff was elected a director for the ensuing year, together with Mrs. Remillard, Messrs. Metcalf, Gelinas, and Simard, and, at the meeting of the directors, held later, on that day, Horton was elected president and manager. Plaintiff, as he testified, entered defendant's employment “about July 1, 1906, and continued in such employment until April 1, 1910.” The minutes of March 18, 1910, read: “Resolved that for good cause, the services of Mr. Edward H. Horton are hereby dispensed with.” Nothing in the record shows the reason for this action. It appeared that plaintiff made no claim for any bonus until after he was discharged. Other facts in the case will be noticed as occasion may require.

[1] Turning now to the contract and in response to appellant's contention first above stated, it seems to us that it was not contemplated by the parties that Horton's bonus, should there be any, was not to be enjoyed until the end of 10 years, nor was it based upon a full accounting of profits and losses as they might appear at the end of the period for which he engaged his services, nor at the termination of his services at a period less than 10 years. We have nothing to do with the cause of his quitting. For the purposes of this case his services terminated by mutual consent and, if not, nothing appears in the record which would prevent his having his rights determined under the contract in accordance with what may seem reasonably certain to have been the intention of the parties in making it.

The contract provides that plaintiff was to receive $500 salary, “to be paid at the end of each current month,” and “in addition to the monthly salary” he was to receive “for further compensation for such services, a bonus on the yearly profits, if any, of the business * * * that is to say, if commencing January 1st, 1907, the annual net profits on the capital invested * * * equals 12 per cent., party of the first part [defendant] agrees to forthwith pay unto party of the second part [plaintiff] a bonus of $1,200, and if such annual profits exceed said 12 per cent.,” he was to be paid an additional bonus of $600 for each additional “one per cent. profit above said 12 per cent.” It seems to us that if the parties contemplated measuring the profits by the result shown only at the end of the 10-year period they failed so to express their intention. The language used indicates that the net profits were to be ascertained annually for the purpose of determining whether Horton should receive annually, “for further compensation for such services,” the bonus provided for. The object was to stimulate his activities by promising a bonus on a certain definite sum should he succeed in producing a certain definite result annually. If he made the company earn 12 per cent. annually upon a certain capital fixed by the company, he was to receive annually $1,200, and for each additional one per cent. over 12 per cent. he was to receive $600. The profit sharing feature of Horton's contract must have been intended as an inducement to him in engaging his services for 10 years and it hardly seems reasonable to suppose that no bonus was to have been allowed him until the expiration of the 10 years, and then only upon a showing that he had earned as net profits for the company each year at least $48,980, or 12 per cent., on a fixed capital the earning capacity of which might, in the course of events, greatly diminish. The contract may be regarded as entire in respect of the term of Horton's service and at the same time reasonably construed to mean that he should be paid the bonus promised at the end of any year when earned. In using the word “forthwith” in connection with the payment of the bonus when the annual net profit equals 12 per cent. we think it fair to assume that the bonus was to be paid whenever in any year the net profits on the fixed capital amounted to the sum named. Nor can it be reasonably said that a contrary construction should be given the contract because Horton made no claim for bonus until he was discharged. There is nothing in the record tending to show that this delay in making his claim was intended as giving a construction to the contract.

Appellant cites certain cases in support of its contention, reliance being placed particularly upon Thomas v. Columbia Phonograph Co., 144 Wis. 470, 129 N. W. 523, 524. Respondent cites Jennery v. Olmstead, 90 N. Y. 363, as fully supporting his contention.

In the Wisconsin case the question arose upon the construction of a contract reading as follows: “May 7, 1904. Confirming my personal interview of this date with you, you are hereby appointed manager of our Milwaukee office to take effect May 1, 1904, at a salary of $25 per week, with a commission of one-half (½) of one per cent. (1%) on the cash receipts of your office from sales, and ten per cent. (10%) of the net profits of the office up to a total profit of $2,000 per month; and thereafter on the basis of five per cent. (5%) of such profits; the profits in question to be determined at and by our executive office, and notice thereof to be duly sent you by such office as determined by them.”

It appeared that plaintiff entered upon the performance of his services May 1, 1904, and continued until early in the year 1908. Each month he sent a report to the executive office of the cash receipts during the month from sales at the Milwaukee office, and received from the executive office a statement showing receipts of the office, certain deductions therefrom and the net profits for the month on which his commission was to be based. The court held that “the true construction of this contract is that the fiscal period for computation of net profits is the month, but that the real period to which net profits refers is the period of plaintiff's service.” Said the court: “And this is the construction which the parties themselves have put upon the contract as shown by competent evidence consisting of monthly statements rendered to the plaintiff and the statement of commission account from May 1, 1905, to July 31, 1906, also that of March 5, 1907, in which the net profits of one month were offset against the losses of other months. The plaintiff acquiesced in this mode of computation.” The opinion concludes as follows: “On the whole case there was no question to go to the jury, no disputed issue of fact, merely the construction of the written contract and the effect of subsequent written statements upon the practical interpretation given to it by the parties. The plaintiff showed no right to recover on the evidence."

It is not possible to say how far "the effect of subsequent written statements upon the practical interpretation given it [the contract] by the parties" influenced the minds of the judges in their construction of the contract. Indeed, the parties themselves having given a practical interpretation to the contract, the court would have been fully justified in following it without attempting an interpretation of its own.

The New York case was where defendant Olmstead entered the service of the Saratoga Savings Bank as actuary, August 19, 1867, under a contract the only part of which appearing in the report was as follows: "That as compensation for his [Olmstead's] services in that capacity [general actuary] he receive such sum or sums from the net profits of the institution, as such profits, after paying all incidental expenses, may warrant, not to exceed $1,000.00 per annum." It appeared that Olmstead's services were terminated about January 14, 1873. The action was by the assignee of the bank upon Olmstead's bond against him and his sureties, growing out of certain funds drawn out by Olmstead about January 1, 1873, which the bank claimed was in excess of his earnings. The trial court found, in the accounting, that, on July 1, 1869, the bank had earned $648.43 net profits, but for the purpose of fixing the sum to which Olmstead was entitled, the court took into account the whole period of five years, during which he was in the bank's employment, not making annual rests, but reducing the profits of one year by losses in a subsequent year, and this method of computation was sought to be justified on the ground that the contract was entire for the whole period of service, and that nothing became due to Olmstead until the expiration of his employment, however long it might continue. This was held not to be a reasonable construction of the contract. Unfortunately the report does not disclose whether or not Olmstead engaged his services for any definite period of time which makes it of uncertain application here. However, it was said on appeal: "The natural interpretation of the transaction is that the bank was willing to pay a salary of $1,000 a year, out of the net profits of the year, and Olmstead was willing to serve, taking the hazard of the profits being sufficient to pay his salary. If profits were not earned, he would get no compensation, and it would not become a charge on future earnings. If earned, he was entitled to be paid, and the bank could not charge against the profits of one year the losses of a succeeding year. We think therefore the court erred in not crediting him with the whole profits of 1869. * * * Nor does the fact that the defendant Olmstead did not credit himself with the year's profits at the time, or the other circumstances, show a practical construction of the contract contrary to its natural meaning."

Without regard to the light which may be thrown upon the question by these cases, we think the construction given by the trial court to the contract here involved was justified by the language used in the contract itself, and that the court properly confined itself to the profits for the year 1907.

[2] We are next to notice appellant's point that the inventory of 1907 made no allowance for depreciation of plant and equipment, and this although plaintiff had, as is claimed, said that such depreciation was customary and would be made by him. There was evidence that before this contract was entered into, and while plaintiff was in defendant's employment, he gave it as his opinion that there should be made in the books of the company depreciation of the plant and equipment. Witness Gelinis, secretary of the company, testified to a conversation he had with Horton "shortly after he became connected with the company." "Mr. Horton said that all manufacturing companies allowed so much for depreciation annually, and as near as I can remember, I think that he fixed it at about 10 per cent. He said that an allowance for depreciation should have been made by the Remillard Brick Company in the years prior to that time. He recommended that on his coming into the company. He said that it was the custom of manufacturing companies. I gathered from what he said that that would be the method pursued hereafter. He said that it was customary, that it was generally done with manufacturing concerns, and he wanted to know why we had not done it prior to that time."

Witness Miller, defendant's bookkeeper, testified: That Horton became connected with the company in July, 1906. "Subsequent to that time I had several talks with Mr. Horton on the subject of depreciation of the property and plant of the defendant. To the best of my recollection we had one of these conversations in the latter part of 1906. Mr. Horton, in looking at things, explained to us that in his business in San Francisco he had written off so much for depreciation every year. * * * To the best of my recollection he said that that was what he proposed to do with Remillard Brick Company's affairs and with their plant. To write off a certain amount to 'Profit and Loss' for depreciation every year, which I am pretty sure he said would be 10 per cent."

Witness Walker, superintendent of brickyards and sales agent, testified to conversations he had with Horton in which the latter said that "the inventory of 1906 was incorrect, that it should have been depreciated, and that it was the mode of procedure of manufacturing concerns to depreciate their inventory, and now since he had become identified with the company he proposed to depreciate that inventory about 10 per cent. until he had marked it off to what he called velvet. * * * The reason that he gave for his intention to mark off for depreciation was that that was the mode of procedure in all manufacturing business."

The claim of defendant is that when the inventory for 1907 was made, not only was it the custom among manufacturing concerns to depreciate articles in their inventories, but that Horton had agreed so to make defendant's inventory, and that this understanding, as well as the custom, entered into and formed part of the contract sued upon. The trial court had Horton's version of these conversations before it and what he did in the matter and why he did it. Horton testified: "Some time in September, 1906, I had a conversation with Mr. Walker on the local train in Oakland. I told Mr. Walker that I had been talking with Mr. Gelinis about the inventories. I mentioned that I noticed that each year for the past years the brickkilns had been taken at the same price, and that Mr. Gelinis had said that Mr. Remillard considered that was all right, because the kilns were kept in first-class repair annually, and that they did not depreciate with age; that they were as good at that time as when they were built, and further than that Mr. Walker said that the kilns were built at a time when the price of labor was very low, and that they would cost a very much higher price to build them at the present time, and therefore Mr. Remillard thought that the price that he set upon them was right. Mr. Walker further remarked that at about what the price of labor would be at the time we were talking that the kilns were worth all that they were taken at. I said that the items of machinery and many other things were held by the company at the same price from year to year in the annual inventory. Mr. Walker said that everything had been kept up in first-class condition, and that Mr. Remillard had always put those prices in the inventory up to the time of his death because, as Mr. Remillard said, he considered them fair prices, and that the increase in the value of the real estate would more than offset any depreciation. Mr. Walker said that there was a great increase in the value of the real estate. I said to him that his statements agreed with what Mr. Gelinas had told me. I do not remember of Mr. Walker being there at any time when I was writing up the inventory. I was a part of two or three days in making up the inventory of 1907. I made up that inventory in my office and partly at home nights. I assisted in making the inventory of 1906 at Mr. Gelinas' request, and the prices for that inventory were obtained from Simard, Gelinas, and Walker, Harry Walker, and Frank Miller. Simard was general superintendent of the three brickyards of defendant. Harry Walker was a salesman and shipping clerk in the Oakland office, dispatcher of teams, and had general supervision over the stable. I did not suggest the declaration of the $25,000 dividend of the corporation under the resolution of January 21, 1909. I had a conversation with Mr. Gelinas with reference to the inventory of 1906. I told him that there were certain inventory prices, particularly the prices on the kilns, that had been taken at the same amount each year, and I asked him the reason. He replied by saying that they were built years ago at a time when labor was cheap; that they had been kept up annually in first-class repair. He said they were as good to-day as ever; that at the present time it would cost more to build them than what they were inventoried at. He said that as to other items they had been passed upon by Mr. P. N. Remillard, and as everything had been kept up in good condition, the various articles had been inventoried for that reason at the price indicated. He said, as an offset to that, some of their properties had increased largely in value. He said that the three-quarter block bounded by Second, Third, and Clay streets in Oakland increased in value, which would more than offset any depreciation in value in other articles. I said that I thought he was right. That it was a family concern and a close corporation, and that such course was very often pursued by such corporations. He said that the water front property that the company had just previously purchased was a good purchase, and that it would be very valuable in the course of time; that the company should have bought it years before when they could have bought it for a very low figure as compared with the price for which it was purchased. This was about all that he said in that conversation."

Further explaining his connection with the 1907 inventory, speaking of a conversation with Mr. Gelinas, he testified: "I had a conversation with him in January, 1908, as to the inventory of 1907 brick. I told him that the brick had been taken in the inventory of 1907 at their cost as figured out by Mr. Frank Miller. He said that he thought Miller's cost was all right, because Mr. Miller said that he had checked back and proved all of his figures which were his costs. I did not make that inventory of 1907. I did not help figure the cost of brick in that inventory, and I was not present when Miller figured the cost of brick. In December, 1907, Mr. Gelinas said that it was a busy time of the year, and asked me to assist them with some of the work. He asked me to write out the inventory for them." He further testified that he had a conversation with Mr. Miller in the fall of 1906, when he told Miller that in his business "we had a system of marking off depreciation, and that everything had been marked off; that some houses had a way of marking off depreciation, some 5 per cent., others 10 per cent., others 15 per cent." He explained that he found, in looking over the books, "that the manner in which they had been kept would not permit the profits to be shown on an individual article, such as cement, lime, plaster, and other items, that I thought they should be segregated so that the books would show as to whether we were making or losing money on those articles. * * * I told them we could deal with the subject of brick and other articles in the same manner." He made similar suggestions as to keeping the cost of making green bricks, the cost of burning the bricks, and delivering them to the cars, also a separate account with the boarding house, another for the stable, and another for the real estate. The reform suggested by Horton in these particulars was carried out in making up the 1907 inventory, but while some articles were either depreciated or no value at all carried out, other items, as they appeared in the 1906 inventory, were carried into the 1907 inventory without change, following what had been the method pursued by the company in previous years—the method adopted in making up the 1906 inventory which was taken as fixing the capital on which Horton was to earn his bonus.

We think the evidence was such as left the trial court at liberty to reject the claim of defendant that there was any agreement between plaintiff and defendant as to the method to be pursued in making inventories. Nor was there evidence of a custom as to depreciating inventories from which the court as matter of law should have found had become a part of the contract. There was testimony of expert accountants to the effect that many large and important manufacturing concerns in this and other countries very generally depreciate their inventories annually, the ratio depending upon the character of the business and of the articles inventoried, but not always the same ratio by concerns carrying on similar business. In some cases the depreciation is made upon individual articles, the ratio necessarily varying as the character of the article varies in its tenacity, its actual value, or as to its continued usefulness. In other cases the companies make a certain horizontal depreciation on the entire inventory. Appellant has, with much industry, brought together in its brief the opinions of many authors on this subject. But we find it hopeless to deduce any fixed, unchanging rule of depreciation by consulting these writers on accounting. Prof. Hatfield, of the chair of accounting, University of California, in his recent work on Modern Accounting, differing with some other writers, very sensibly, we think, says that the value of property must be the value to the owner of a going concern. We quote, at page 80, his remarks upon revaluations: "Shall they be put down at the original acquisition price or at some other valuation? If at some other value, shall it be the current market price, the present value to the concern, or the price they would bring in liquidation? The general principle, which, with various applications, is now universally accepted, is: The inventory should be on the basis of the value of the assets to the present holder as a going concern. The proper value is that which they have to the holding concern, and not that which they might have to other persons, whether these persons are ordinary customers, or those who might bid in the assets at a liquidation sale." At page 134 the author says: "Where the courts prescribe depreciation they have generally allowed the basis and, indeed, the period to be left to the discretion of the company's authorities." It is not possible to formulate a universal rule of depreciation which must, as matter of law, be followed by the courts. Companies have the right to establish their own method of arriving at their profits. One of the expert witnesses testified that where depreciation is charged against equipment at the end of the year, it "is part of the manufacturing and becomes absorbed in the cost of the article produced; it is a part of the cost of production, in other words, it is added to the cost value of the article produced, added in the inventory to the cost value of the article." This illustrates how widely systems differ in making inventories.

There is not sufficient evidence that the parties contracted with reference to the custom contended for by defendant. On the contrary, the inference would seem to be justified that if they had any custom in mind, it was that of the company itself, pursued about 30 years without variation. This disputed inventory of 1907 was the basis for the profit and loss account for that year. It was well known to the directors, and it cannot be doubted that the executive committee knew all about it. The results were carried forward into the inventories and profit and loss accounts for succeeding years, and there is no evidence of any objection having been made by the directors or the executive committee or the finance committee to the correctness of these accounts, and none at all until the question arose in this action. The integrity of the 1907 inventory is not to be discredited solely on the ground that plaintiff was president and manager, and on a suspicion that he took advantage of his office to impose upon the company. Fraud or bad faith, or unduly inflating the inventory, or of having amended the by-laws permitting a 10-year contract, cannot be imputed to him without some evidence of it, and there is none. Besides, it is not to be overlooked that the governing power of the corporation resided in the directors, and ultimate responsibility was upon them. There was an executive committee charged with the duty of making "alterations, changes, and improvements in detail as to the systems or methods" to be adopted in conducting the business, and no change was recommended by this committee. The fact that the capital on which Horton was to earn his bonus was determined by the 1905 inventory, prepared in this previously adopted way, subsequently followed, would seem to indicate that the company was content to abide by the old way of making inventories. These inventories contained many important items which would have disappeared long before had the depreciation method contended for been adopted. The kilns inventoried in 1906 and 1907 at the same value (one at $15,000, one at $18,000 and two at $20,000 each) would not have appeared at all as assets had they been depreciated annually even 5 per cent. in previous years; and so of many other expensive parts of the equipment.

The reason for this course, given by the company's officers, that there had been a large increase in the value of the real estate owned by the company, which had not been carried into the inventories, thus offsetting any apparent depreciation of the equipment, is by no means unsound. Then, too, it was shown that many perishable things were replaced and their cost charged to expense account—for example, brick molds, it was testified, wore out in a season and were replaced yearly. A large number of horses was used for teaming purposes, but the required number was kept full by purchase. So of many things which might be mentioned. The truth is that the rule of depreciation is largely theoretical, and is adopted by merchants and manufacturers as a protection against being deceived as to their assets, and in effect amounts often to accumulating what might not inaptly be called a surplus, if not in money, still in money value. As an illustration, we have these brick-kilns. They passed into the inventories unchanged in value, and were proven to be as good as new and to have an actual value of something like $75,000, and yet, had the inventories been depreciated from the time they were built, they would have stood on the books at $1 long before 1905. Had all the items of equipment been similarly treated, the books would have shown but few assets except the land, the outstanding accounts, brick on hand, and cash, and yet the company would have a completely equipped and operating plant worth many thousands of dollars. The rule of depreciating inventories, no doubt, has its advantages, and the wisdom in following it is not to be questioned. It is very comfortable for a manufacturer to know that he has, by his earnings, been able to keep his plant running for 10 years and, while he has depreciated his equipment annually 10 per cent., and until it stands on his books at $1, he has made the plant earn enough to give him dividends equal to his original capital invested, pay the cost of running, repairs, and replacements and have remaining an active factory. This would be what Horton said was "getting on velvet," but we cannot see that his contract required of him any such accomplishment, or that he promised to achieve it. It would seem altogether unreasonable for the court now to say that Horton ought to have instituted a new system of accounting, not contemplated by the parties—a system which if enforced in this action would deprive him of any bonus, and which would violate the principle upon which the basis of the company's capital rested. In short, the court is asked to hold that for the purpose of this case the alleged unscientific method of fixing the values found in the 1905 inventory shall stand unchanged as the measure of defendant's capital, but in ascertaining profits for 1907 a radically different method of fixing values must be adopted. Obviously, in all fairness, if we are arbitrarily to depreciate the inventory of 1907, we should go back and readjust the capital by treating the inventory of 1905 in the same manner. We can do neither, in our opinion, without violating the contract.

We come now to consider some of the specific objections to the inventory of 1907, and to notice how and by whom it was prepared. We cannot hope to consider all the items entering into this inventory of more than 100 exhibits.

[3] There were certain exhibits introduced by plaintiff, being respectively, "Profit and Loss Sheet," "Surplus Sheet," "Assets and Liability Account of '07," and "Surplus Account," which showed the profits for 1907 to be $75,786.56. The trial court, rightly, as we think, admitted these exhibits (which showed the profits as just stated) on the theory that they constituted at least prima facie admissions by defendant of the profits of its business upon the closing of the books December 31, 1907.

[4] Plaintiff's contention, as to depreciation, is "that the annual statement of its business condition December 31, 1907, made by defendant and acted upon by it, must stand, except in those particulars in which it has been shown to be in error by defendant's evidence." At a meeting of the directors, held February 3, 1908, all present—

"The secretary submitted the regular annual statement of the resources and liabilities of the company, which report, summarized, shows net results as follows:

Total assets, Dec. 31, 1907.....	$567,284 39
Total liabilities	491,497 83

"Attest: J. B. Gelinis, Secretary."

Plaintiff introduced the inventory of 1907 and some further exhibits of the proceedings of the directors and stockholders found in the minutes and rested. The court opened the door to defendant to dispute the correctness of this inventory, and it is with defendant's objection and evidence in support thereof we are next to deal.

Defendant introduced witnesses who testified to what in their opinion should be the depreciation on certain named kinds of property. With the exception of witness Smith and witness Walker, the other witnesses had no personal knowledge of the property. They simply testified to what the ratio of depreciation should be on the property found in the inventory. Smith visited the plant, in January, 1911, and, judging from its character and then appearance, he fixed a ratio of depreciation for 1907 on the buildings and some of the machinery. Walker was in defendant's employment, and his testimony related to a number of articles, some he thought worthless, but none of them of much value. These witnesses thus testified as to wagons and harness, machinery, boilers, and other things of that character in brickyards, the schooners operated in shipping bricks, brick machinery, boilers, engines, and other equipment, also as to the worthlessness and worn-out character of clay dumps, molds and some other articles in defendant's three brickyards, which were located at Pleasanton, San Jose and Green Brae.

Witness Barber, an expert accountant, "relying on the testimony of these several witnesses, and not on any arbitrary annual rate or percentage of depreciation fixed by himself," as stated in defendant's opening brief, "prepared Defendant's Exhibit N, showing the depreciation which should be made at these several yards and in equipment other than manufacturing—these latter including horses, harness, and wagons, the schooners, a hay cutter and electric motor. This exhibit N bears the following caption: "Estimated depreciation and obsolescence on equipment, etc., used in connection with manufacturing, based on inventory of December 31, 1906." The witness took the 1906 inventory and placed the then inventory value of the property in the first column, in the second the per cent. of depreciation, and in the third the amount. The plan of this exhibit was to ascertain the value of an item in the 1906 inventory, depreciate it as the witnesses had testified it should be, and then depreciate the same item in the 1907 inventory to make it conform to his rule of depreciation. The exhibit shows that the witness wrote off values at rates from 5 to 20 per cent. Summed up the exhibit shows:

San Jose yard depreciation.....	$ 4,067 51
Pleasanton yard depreciation.....	5,772 85
Greenbrae yard depreciation.....	3,273 71
Equipment other than manufacturing at various yards.....	3,737 80

Total $16,851 87

Outbuildings and improvements he wrote off 5 per cent. The kilns were depreciated 10 per cent. and most of the remaining items in about equal numbers were depreciated 10 per cent. and 20 per cent. He next wrote off:

For clay taken from the land.....	$ 4,304 55
For rebates on sales of bricks in 1907.....	432 00
An item relating to 1906 business improperly credited to 1907 business.....	333 05
Purchase of lime in 1907 not entered until 1908	420 00
Two other similar items.....	99 20
Accounts of 1907 not collected.....	2,238 00
Difference in certain 1907 brick when valued at 1906 rates.....	3,231 65
Error in misplacing a decimal in this brick item	1,390 49

Total $12,448 94

To these errors add depreciation..... 16,851 87

Gives total to be deducted from apparent surplus $29,500 81

These figures reduce the profits below $48,980, which had to be earned before any bonus was allowed.

Of plaintiff's connection with the making of this inventory we have already given some of the testimony. It was the work of Gelinas, Miller, Walker, Simard, and Revolta, all in responsible positions with the company, some of them stockholders, assisted by Horton, as explained by him. Horton was examined at great length; his attention being directed to the inventory, item after item. His testimony shows that the handwriting was by different of these persons and sometimes by himself; that the values were given by the persons apparently best informed as to the item, sometimes by one, sometimes by two or more, and sometimes by Gelinas or another in consultation with Horton. As heretofore stated, the evidence was that some articles were depreciated to accord with their value, but some also were set down at the value shown in the 1906 inventory. We do not, however, attach significance to these details further than that the evidence shows that the inventory was mainly the work of trusted employes of the company who had been long in its service, and who were not only familiar with the property and its value, but were also familiar with the method adopted and practiced by the company for many years in making its annual inventories. We do not feel disposed to add much to what has already been said with respect to the contention that the trial court erred in not following defendant's proposed rule of depreciation. The evidence shows that the inventories had been taken upon a physical appraisalment of the properties rather than by a horizontal depreciation method. As illustrating what was done, the inventory of the Oakland stable account, consisting of horses, wagons, harness, etc., may be given. The inventory of 1907 shows a depreciation of $1,175 as against the value of 1906.

There is a fundamental error, it seems to us, in the basis of expert Barber's schedules. He proceeded on the assumption that the inventory of 1906 was a correct starting point from which to develop his method and ascertain values. The reason given by him was as follows: "I used the inventory of 1906 as a basis of the valuation for the reason that the property purchased during 1907 might have been purchased so near the end of the year as not to be properly considered as having depreciated at all during that year." This is not satisfactory. A very large per cent. of the property had been in use many years, and, as we have pointed out, should, on Barber's theory, long before have been written off. For example, he took the kilns at the valuation of 1906, whereas they had been in use more than 20 years. Most if not all the real estate was purchased prior to 1906, and it amounted to more than one-third of the entire values. Obviously, if his method should be applied in making the 1907 inventory, he should have started with one framed in accordance with his method, inasmuch as he was dealing with plaintiff and his rights under the contract, and not alone with the company's rights. It might not have mattered, if only the defendant was concerned, where and when he found his basis to work from; although, it seems to us, it would have been but fair to the company, in starting a new system, either consistently to keep in mind the old method, or to begin with a physical appraisalment of all assets. We have already seen that to apply Barber's method to the past years of defendant's business the capital of $408,167, on which Horton was to earn 12 per cent. net profits, before sharing in any surplus, would have been reduced far below the original capital with which the corporation started. Our conclusion, as to the schedule of depreciations prepared by Barber, is that it should be disregarded.

Turning now to the schedule of miscellaneous items charged off, amounting to $12,448.94, let us discover whether there is merit in the claim. One of the large items of this schedule was $4,304.55 for clay used. Barber testified: "The manner in which the entry was handled was such as to make its effect zero, the debit canceling any effect. I mean the credit canceling the effect of the debit." He testified, however, that "there was no reduction made at the end of the year in the value of the real estate," from which he concluded that there must be a depreciation made to the amount he finds the clay was worth. The answer to this is that the company had not, in previous years, depreciated the real estate on this account and in 1907 the old method of valuing the real estate persisted.

The method adopted by the company applied alike to all its property. Furthermore, the expense account was burdened with the taxes and other expenses attending, not only the land producing clay, but all the real estate and its improvements in addition to such land, and there was a good deal of it. It was shown that the real estate had increased in value. These considerations would seem to account satisfactorily for the defendant's adhering to the values given in former inventories.

The items, rebates on goods sold, $432, railroad rebates, $333.05, lime purchased in 1907 charged in 1908 at $420, and other similar items, $99.20, were, as we understand plaintiff's reply brief, conceded as proper corrections. Of these purchases in 1907 ($519.20) Barber testified: "There was a much larger amount of business charged in 1907 so as it more than offset this amount. I did not go much further into it."

Of the item, $2,238, uncollected personal accounts, Barber testified: "A portion of that should have been used in reducing the profit account for 1907, and my figures show the amount that should be so charged." Miller, defendant's bookkeeper, testified: "I will say that giving credit to the 1907 account for the amount originated prior to 1907 and charged off during 1907, it would show a net balance of $458.98 that should still be absorbed in 1907. That sum should be charged off"—not, as we read Barber's schedule, $2,238.

The remaining item is $2,261.67, to which is added error in the account $1,390.49, making overvaluation of brick in 1907 inventory as compared with prices used in 1906 inventory, as we understand the claim, the sum of $4,556.51. Barber's attention was called to this item on cross-examination, and he corrected his testimony in chief as follows: "I omitted to figure in some Oakland brick; taking this error, which amounted to $1,354.86, into consideration, the correct difference would be $3,231.37; that is to say, the brick in the 1907 inventory figured at the 1906 inventory prices would amount to $3,231.67 less than the figures appearing in the 1907 inventory, that is after taking into consideration the $1,354.86 error in that inventory, that is on the basis of figuring all the brick in the inventory." We can see no reason why the brick should have been valued, in December, 1907, the same as in December, 1906, unless all the surrounding conditions were the same, which does not appear to have been the case. Horton testified that the market price of hard-burned brick at San Francisco and Oakland at the end of 1907 was "$10 per thousand, ex cars or dock, delivery to be upon freight cars or dock, at the expense of the parties sold to." Hard brick were inventoried 1907 at $6 per M at the Pleasanton yard; at the San Jose yard, $6.178 per M, and at the Greenbrae yard, $6.385 per M. The average price at the three places combined was $6.18 per M.

We have already quoted Horton's testimony in which he stated "that the brick had been taken in the inventory of 1907 at their cost as figured out by Mr. Frank Miller. * * * Miller said that he had checked back and forward all his figures which were his costs." Horton testified: "I did not help figure the cost of brick in that inventory, and I was not present when Miller figured the cost of brick." Barber ascertained from the books the total cost of burned brick to be $63,014.53 and the number on hand at close of 1907 to be 10,200,000, an average per M of $6.17, within less than one-tenth of a cent of the average inventory value.

Barber figured the green brick, 10,715,000, cost, $34,435.36. Of these nearly one-half were inventoried at $2.728 per M, over one-third at $3.377 per M, nearly one-fifth at $4.146, an average but little more than Barber figured the cost.

We do not think that the contention of overvaluation of the brick is sustained by the evidence. They were inventoried by defendant's bookkeeper at cost, and we have shown that his estimate is so near that of Barber's as to make the difference negligible.

Without going further into these accounts, we think it satisfactorily appears that when defendant is allowed the corrections or mistakes shown in its favor, which were sustained by the evidence, and some mistakes concededly in plaintiff's favor, the corrected profit is well within the amount found by the court.

As to the claim that there was an overproduction for the year 1907, which should have been taken into account in figuring values, something in reply should be said. In round numbers, defendant had on hand, at the close of the year, 22½ millions of bricks, about equally divided between burned and green. The amount carried over from 1906 was something over 16,000,000. It will be recalled that the great fire in San Francisco created an abnormal demand for building material, and, although in rebuilding, a much greater proportion of cement than ever before was used, still the demand for brick was large, and the directors might reasonably have supposed it would continue. Bricks sold in 1907 as high as $13.50 per M. That a period of temporary depression later curtailed sales could not have been anticipated. Conditions so changed that in 1908 the company manufactured no brick. But this reaction, which could not have been foreseen, cannot be invoked to affect conditions at the close of 1907. Defendant suggests that it is not a fair construction of the agreement "to hold that defendant should be required to pay Horton a percentage on the material of all properties remaining on hand at the end of the year 1907," for example, this large quantity of carried over bricks. We think the quantity not abnormally great when the conditions are considered. As to its effect upon the accounts the quantity was immaterial. The cost of manufacturing the brick on one side of the account equalized the carried over value—the credit and debit entries neutralizing one another.

We have endeavored to consider all the objections made to the findings and judgment which seem to call for notice, and there remains to dispose of alleged errors in rulings of the court at the trial in refusing to allow certain questions.

[5] Expert witness Barber was asked several questions as to his opinion upon the correctness of the statement of profits. He was asked: "Was your investigation of the books, records, and accounts of the Remillard Brick Company for the year 1907 so thorough as to enable you to state what the profits of that business were for that year if proper accounting methods had been pursued?" He was also asked whether the account of profit and loss was correctly stated, and some other similar questions, calling for his opinion as to whether the "surplus figures $75,786.56 is a correct statement of the corporation for the year 1907." Objections that the questions were immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent were sustained. We cannot see that the defendant was prejudiced by the court's refusal to accept the conclusions reached by the witness instead of its own upon a full consideration of the evidence and the law.

All the facts were before the court, and it then became its duty to decide the issues, and no rule of evidence or of law would compel the court to accept the opinion of the witness as to the conclusions to be drawn from the facts. It certainly was discretionary with the court to avail itself of the witness' opinion deduced from the evidence, and in declining to accept it defendant was not prejudiced, even if the testimony was admissible.

[6] But one further error of this character is called to our attention. Witness Barber was asked whether or not the bricks sold in 1908 were not on an average sold at a loss of $1.59 per thousand. Objection was sustained.

The average price received in 1908 could only be ascertained in closing the books at the end of that year. If, as we have held, plaintiff was entitled to the fruits of his contract as they appeared at the end of the year 1907, it was wholly immaterial what happened in the year 1908.

6. ESCAPE $\hookrightarrow$ 5—OFFENSES.

Under Pen. Code, § 109, it is an offense punishable by imprisonment in the state prison to assist a prisoner to escape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escape, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 5.]

7. CONSPIRACY $\hookrightarrow$ 41—ESCAPE.

Where accused, who was serving a life term, and another convict serving a less term unlawfully conspired to assist one another in escaping from a state prison, each was criminally responsible for the acts of the other committed in the furtherance of the common design, and hence accused was responsible as a principal for the act of his co-conspirator in killing one of the guards; such willful killing being a natural and probable consequence of the execution of the design.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 41.]

8. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1036—APPEAL—OBJECTIONS.

Error cannot be predicated on the admission of testimony, where accused's objections were withdrawn, and it was received without objection.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1631-1640, 2639-2641; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1036.]

9. CONSPIRACY $\hookrightarrow$ 48 — ESCAPE — TRIAL — INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for the killing of a guard by one of two convicts who were attempting to escape from prison, instructions on the liability of one conspirator for the acts of his co-conspirator are warranted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Conspiracy, Cent. Dig. §§ 108-111; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 48.]

10. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1172—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for the killing of a guard by convicts who were attempting to escape, an instruction that, if a convict is informed of an expected attempt to escape, and he does not desire to assist therein, it is his duty to report it, but, if he fails to do so, and willingly joins in and aids, abets, and assists the escape, he is responsible for all the consequences following the conspiracy, is harmless, though it was erroneous in informing the jury that the convict should report the expected attempt.

11. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 753—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction correct in law cannot be held erroneous because, under the evidence, it practically directed the jury to convict accused.

12. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1160½ — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for the killing of a guard by convicts who were attempting to escape, the reading of a section of the Penal Code relating to the liability of convicts for assaulting guards, while erroneous, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3114-3123; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 1160½.]

13. WITNESSES $\hookrightarrow$ 277—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

Accused, who was charged with the murder of a guard killed when accused and another convict attempted to escape, took the stand and testified that he in no way participated in the attack upon the guard. On cross-examination he was asked whether he did not leave his cell with his co-conspirator, intending to overcome the guards and escape, and whether he did not strike the other guard with the intention of aiding his co-conspirator to escape. Held that, while Pen. Code, § 1323, provides that a convict cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, yet, if he offer himself as a witness, he may be cross-examined as to all matters about which he was examined in chief, the cross-examination was not improper, being germane to the examination in chief, and also to the prose-cution's theory that the killing took place as a result of the conspiracy.

14. CRIMINAL LAW ☞ 1170½ — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR.

In such case, as accused was liable as principal in attempting to assist his co-conspirator, a convict serving less than a life term, to escape, regardless of whether he knew the term, cross-examination bringing out that he knew the term for which his co-conspirator was incarcerated was harmless, if erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129-3135; Dec. Dig. ☞ 1170½.]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Herbert E. White, Judge.

Frank Creeks was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. S. Clack, of Visalia, and J. T. Fuller, of Lindsay, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the first degree upon an information charging him with the murder of one J. P. Drewry, in October, 1914, in Sacramento county. This is an appeal from the judgment of death given upon such conviction, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1] 1. Before entering his plea of not guilty defendant made a motion that the information be set aside on the ground "that before the filing thereof the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate." Section 995, Pen. Code. This motion was denied. It was claimed that he had never been committed for trial by a "magistrate." The commitment was by a justice of the peace of Granite township, in Sacramento county. Justices of the peace are magistrates. Section 808, Pen. Code. The claim is that justices' courts were abolished by the amendments of sections 1, 11, and 15 of article 6 of the Constitution, adopted October 10, 1911. The same claim was made in the matter of Woods, 161 Cal. 238, 118 Pac. 792, and we held that the amendments had no such effect. We adhere to the views there expressed.

[2] It was further claimed that the evidence adduced on the preliminary examination before the magistrate did not sufficiently show probable cause to warrant a commitment for trial. Such an objection is not available on motion to set aside an information. By reason of an express statutory provision so declaring (Pen. Code, § 1487, subd. 7), such an objection may be raised on habeas corpus, if timely made, and we know of no other other way in which it can be raised. It is not included in the grounds specified in the statute for the setting aside of an information. The subdivision relied on, that providing for such a motion on the ground that the defendant has not been "legally committed by a magistrate," has no reference to the matter of the sufficiency of the evidence upon which a magistrate has acted. See People v. Beach, 122 Cal. 37, 54 Pac. 369. The trial court did not err in denying the motion to set aside the information.

[3] 2. Complaint is made that the trial court erred in overruling objections to a certain question put to two jurors on their voir dire by the district attorney. Substantially, the question was: If the court instructed the jury in a certain way as to the law, would the jurors follow the instruction? It is claimed that the law would not sanction any such instruction. There is nothing in the nature of the question or in the record to indicate any misconduct on the part of the district attorney in asking the questions, and we are utterly at a loss to perceive how the defendant's cause could have been prejudicially affected by either the questions or the answers thereto.

[4-7] 3. It is claimed that the evidence was insufficient to warrant a conviction of defendant on the charge against him, viz., the murder of J. P. Drewry. To a proper understanding of the claim of defendant in this regard, and also of certain other claims relative to the instructions given or refused, a brief statement of some of the facts is essential. The homicide was committed a few minutes after 8 o'clock on the evening of October 16, 1914, in the California state prison at Folsom. The deceased, Drewry, was an officer of the prison, being sergeant of the first night watch. Defendant was serving a life term therein, adjudged upon conviction of the crime of murder. He was and for about two years next preceding had been occupying a cell with a convict named Phelps, who was serving a term less than life. By 8 o'clock on the evening referred to, all of the prisoners, including defendant and Phelps, had been locked in their respective cells. Through the wicket in the door of their cell defendant and Phelps had a view of the inside gate. About that hour a guard looked into their cell and saw them both therein. Very shortly after 8 o'clock Capt. Drewry, in accordance with his custom, came to the outside from within to obtain certain firearms to distribute among the inside guards; such weapons being allowed to such guards only after the prisoners had been locked in their cells. He obtained the weapons, four revolvers, and with one Kerr, a guard who had charge of the outer gate, walked along the passageway from the outer to the inside gate, which was open, and which Kerr was to close and lock after Drewry had passed through. They were talking as they walked along to the inside gate, and paused a moment as they reached it, apparently to finish the conversation. Here they were attacked by defendant and Phelps, who in the meantime had obtained egress from their cell and reached the gate. It was subsequently ascertained that their cell door had been unlocked from the inside by means of a key fitted in the end of a piece of wire, prepared for that purpose by one or both of them. Phelps had a knife in his possession when they left their cell. Defendant had a dumb bell, and probably also a knife. Defendant attacked Kerr, striking him on the head with the dumb bell and knocking him down or partly down to the floor of the passageway, while Phelps engaged in a struggle with Drewry. Defendant, after so striking Kerr, attempted to pull him inside the inner gate, but Kerr managed to break away, and finally reached the outside gate, which he was unable to lock, not being able to find the key. He shut this gate, defendant reaching it about this time, and threatening to shoot him with one of the revolvers dropped by deceased when attacked. Kerr ran and gave the alarm and returned. In the meantime defendant and Phelps had come through the outside gate into the yard, both armed with revolvers. Shooting ensued between the two convicts and the guards in the yard, with the result that Phelps was shot and killed, and a guard named Maher was shot in the hip and died within a few days. Defendant ran down towards the river and escaped, but was recaptured the next night at a place named Loomis, a few miles from the prison. Drewry was found a few minutes after the struggle at the inside gate, on the inside, lying near one of the cells, mortally wounded, and died a few minutes thereafter. An examination disclosed two wounds, one on the scalp and one on the back of the neck below the skull, both inflicted by some sharp instrument or instruments, and both fatal. His death was caused by these wounds, which clearly had been inflicted in the struggle near the inside gate. A pocketknife belonging to defendant was found in the yard along the route taken by him as he escaped. Drewry was a larger and more powerful man than Phelps. No prisoner except defendant and Phelps was at any time after 8 o'clock out of his cell, or participated in an effort to escape.

It may be assumed for the purposes of this decision that the evidence fails to sufficiently show that defendant personally inflicted any wound on Capt. Drewry or personally assaulted him in the conflict near the inside gate, and that in such conflict he devoted his efforts exclusively to Kerr; and, further, that it fails to show any express specific agreement between Phelps and himself to kill anybody in their previously conceived and concerted plan to escape from the prison. This is a matter of no moment in this case. The evidence does clearly show that defendant and Phelps had conspired and combined together to commit an unlawful act, viz., to accomplish their escape, the escape of both Phelps and defendant, from the state prison, and in the accomplishment of that purpose to use such force as was found to be necessary. It was such that a jury could not reasonably conclude otherwise. The law made it a felony on the part of Phelps, a prisoner confined in a state prison for a term less than for life, to escape or to attempt to escape therefrom (sections 105 and 106, Pen. Code), and any person aiding and abetting in the commission of this felony would be a principal therein (sec. 31, Pen. Code). So that it is immaterial here that the law does not make it a crime for one undergoing a life sentence in a state prison to himself escape or attempt to escape. The conspiracy included, as a part of the joint purpose, the accomplishment of something admittedly unlawful and a felony, namely, viz., the escape of Phelps. Of course, there is no force whatever in the suggestion that defendant could not, by reason of his status as a prisoner for life in a state prison, be held as a principal under the provisions of section 31, Penal Code. The conspiracy likewise included the commission by defendant of the felony defined by section 109, Penal Code, which provides that "any person who willfully assists * * * any prisoner confined in any prison or jail * * * to escape, or in an attempt to escape from such prison or jail, * * * is punishable as provided in section 108 of the Penal Code," viz., by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding ten years and by a fine. The willful killing of any person standing between defendant and Phelps and the consummation of their escape was an ordinary, probable and natural consequence of the execution of their common design.

The law applicable in such cases is well stated in People v. Kauffman, 152 Cal. 331, 334, 92 Pac. 861, 862, where it is substantially said that, under the well-settled rule of law governing the criminal liability of each of several engaging in an unlawful conspiracy or combination, if several parties conspire or combine together to commit any unlawful act, each is criminally responsible for the acts of his associates or confederates committed in furtherance of any prosecution of the common design for which they combine. It was further said:

"In contemplation of law the act of one is the act of all. Each is responsible for everything done by his confederates which follows incidentally in the execution of the common design as one of its probable and natural consequences, even though it was not intended as a part of the original design or common plan."

Of course, as said in the case just referred to, if one member of the party departs from the original design as agreed on by all the members, and does an act which was not only not contemplated by those who entered into the common purpose, "but was not in furtherance thereof, and not the natural or legitimate consequence of anything connected therewith, the person guilty of such act, if it was itself unlawful, would alone be responsible there." But there is no reasonable basis in the evidence for the application of this doctrine here. Not only was the killing of any officer or guard standing between defendant and Phelps and their escape a probable and natural consequence of their plan to escape, as that plan is shown by their acts and conduct, but the evidence shows quite clearly that their plan contemplated the overcoming of Drewry and Kerr by such force and to such an extent as was necessary at the very place where they attacked them, and, these men having been rendered powerless to resist them or impede their movements, their subsequent escape through the gates into the yard. Under such circumstances, Creeks would be equally guilty with Phelps of the murder of Drewry even if he did not personally inflict any wound on him, for under the law the acts of Phelps in the matter were the acts of the defendant also. The verdict of the jury in this regard is not only sufficiently sustained by the evidence, but we do not see how any other verdict could have been given. See, also, People v. Ford (App.) 143 Pac. 1075.

[8] 4. To the claim that the statement or confession made by defendant very shortly after his recapture was improperly admitted in evidence, it is sufficient to note that the objections made to its introduction were withdrawn by his attorneys, and that it was received in evidence without objection on their part.

[9] 5. In view of what we have said as to the rules of law applicable to such a case as this, we find no prejudicial error in the matter of instructions of the court to the jury.

It was proper to instruct the jury that any prisoner confined in the state prison for a term less than life who attempts to escape therefrom is guilty of a felony, to acquaint them with the fact that any conspiracy or combination including among its purposes the accomplishment of the escape of Phelps was a conspiracy for the accomplishment of an unlawful act. The instruction that all persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, are principals in the crime, was, as we have seen, a correct statement of the law applicable to this case, as also was the instruction that one who aids, abets, and assists a convict confined in the state prison for a term less than life to escape therefrom is guilty of a felony.

[10] The following instruction was given: "If a convict is informed of an expected attempt to break or escape from a state prison to be made by a convict confined therein for a term less than life, and his help is sought by said convict so planning it, if he in good faith does not desire to assist therein, it is his duty to report the same to the proper officer of the prison. And if he fails to do so and willingly joins in and aids, abets, and assists such escape, he is responsible for all the consequences that follow said conspiracy."

This instruction is somewhat loosely drawn, and we cannot commend it. The court should not have instructed the jury that it was the duty of a convict informed of a proposed attempt to escape to report the same to the proper officers of the prison. No question relating to any moral obligation resting on defendant was involved in the issues being tried, and the defendant was violating no law in failing to give information of the proposed escape. But we do not see how, in view of the context, this statement could have prejudiced defendant. It was immediately followed by the statement:

"And if he fails to do so, and willingly joins in and aids, abets, and assists such escape, he is responsible," etc.

This purported to define the only circumstances under which defendant could be held criminally liable under the facts stated in the instruction, whatever his failure to give such information to the officers. He must go further, and willingly join in and aid, abet, and assist, etc. It would be unreasonable to assume that any prejudice resulted to defendant from this instruction.

[11] The instruction stating substantially that, if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt by the evidence of certain specified things, the defendant must be held guilty of murder, even though he did not personally inflict the fatal wound, correctly state the law. If, as suggested by counsel, the giving of this instruction "was about the same thing as telling the jury to convict the defendant of the crime charged," this is so only because the evidence so clearly shows the elements essential to conviction as to leave no reasonable doubt of their existence.

[12] The court might well have omitted to read to the jury section 246, Penal Code, for it had nothing to do with the case. We are unable to see, however, how it could have misled the jury, or in any way prejudiced defendant's cause.

One or two other instructions complained of require no notice here, as they were unquestionably correct.

Certain instructions requested by defendant were properly refused. The first referred to in his brief did not correctly state the law, inasmuch as it substantially involved the proposition that it was not a crime on the part of one confined in a state prison for life to aid and assist one confined therein for a term less than life to escape or attempt to escape therefrom. The second requested instruction referred to did not correctly state the law, inasmuch as it declared substantially that defendant could not be convicted of murder unless he actually struck the fatal blow that killed Drewry, or unless it was specifically agreed between Phelps and defendant, as a part of a conspiracy to escape "entered" into by them, that they would "kill and murder any one who interfered" with their escape. As we have seen, no such specific agreement to kill was essential to defendant's guilt. The same objection exists as to the third requested instruction referred to.

[13] 6. It is claimed that, under the rulings of the trial court, defendant was compelled to be a witness against himself, in that on his cross-examination he was examined, over his objection, as to matters about which he had not testified on his direct examination. On his direct examination he had testified that he was present at the conflict in the corridor, near the inside gate, saw part of the fight between Phelps and Capt. Drewry, saw Phelps strike Drewry, did not participate "in any manner" in that fight, and did not have his hands on Drewry in any way; that at the end of that fight between Phelps and Drewry he picked up from the floor his own knife and a "gun," and that he had last seen this knife in his cell that same evening and had not brought it from there; that he left his cell that evening just ahead of Phelps; that Phelps had his own knife in his hand when they came out of the cell. The whole purpose of his testimony on direct examination was to show that he was in no way a participant in the attack on Capt. Drewry, and had absolutely nothing to do with it; that he was, in fact, an innocent spectator taking no part, so far as his testimony showed, in any attack on either Drewry or Kerr. He did not in his direct examination say anything about his attack on Kerr. The prosecution claimed, and there was considerable foundation for the claim, that not only was defendant a co-conspirator with Phelps in a plan to escape together, using such force as was necessary to accomplish their purpose, but also that in the attack made on the officers, having temporarily disposed of Kerr, he personally took part in the struggle of Phelps with Capt. Drewry, who was a larger and stronger man than Phelps, and that with his own knife, already referred to, he inflicted the fatal wound found on the back of Capt. Drewry's neck, below the skull. On cross-examination defendant was asked, among other things, "Well, you left the cell with Phelps with the intention of overcoming the guards and escaping from the jail, did you not?" to which he answered, "Yes, sir." "In accordance with the agreement made by you and Phelps before leaving the cell, you struck Kerr?" to which he answered, "Yes, sir." "Your object in striking Kerr was to overpower him and aid Phelps in getting out of the prison?" to which the answer was, "That was the object under the circumstances." We are at a loss to see why that was not proper cross-examination, in view of his testimony given on direct examination.

The well-settled rule in this state as to cross-examination of a defendant is stated in People v. Gallagher, 100 Cal. 475, 35 Pac. 80, 83. While a defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, if he offer himself as a witness "he may be cross-examined by the counsel for the people as to all matters about which he was examined in chief." Section 1323, Pen. Code. The statute places no limitation or restriction upon the extent or character of his cross-examination "as to all matters about which he was examined in chief," and upon these matters he may be cross-examined as fully as any other witness.

"Any question which would have the tendency to elicit from him the whole truth about any matter upon which he had been examined in chief, or which would explain, or qualify, or destroy the force of his direct testimony, whether it be to give the whole of a communication or transaction of which he had given only a part, or to show by his own admission that he had made contrary statements, or that his conduct had been inconsistent with the statements given in his direct testimony, and thus throw discredit upon them, would be legitimate cross-examination."

Again, in People v. Dole, 122 Cal. 486, 491, 55 Pac. 581, 583 (68 Am. St. Rep. 50), it was said by the late Chief Justice Beatty, a majority of the court concurring in his views, that:

"Any fact may be called out on cross-examination which a jury might deem inconsistent with the direct testimony of a witness, and a defendant testifying in his own behalf is in this respect put upon the same plane with other witnesses."

In the light of these declarations, we are of the opinion that no error was committed in allowing this cross-examination. One of the matters regarding which defendant testified on his direct examination was the attack on Capt. Drewry near the inside gate, and his own absolute lack of participation therein. The matters called for on cross-examination tended to show that the assault was, in fact, a joint assault by defendant and Phelps on both Kerr and Drewry, undertaken and carried into execution by them, for the purpose of accomplishing their escape from the prison, and they were of such a nature that the jury might well deem them inconsistent with the direct testimony of the witness as to the part played by him in the encounter near the inside gate, and, under the circumstances shown, even as to his statement to the effect that he did not personally assault Capt. Drewry. It was at least very unlikely that in such a joint assault made under such circumstances as were disclosed by the cross-examination the defendant, armed with a knife, as the jury had the right to conclude from the evidence he was, refrained from assisting Phelps in his struggle with Capt. Drewry, when he had the opportunity to do so. The cross-examination thus tended to discredit and destroy the force of the testimony given by defendant on his direct examination as to this very matter.

the time was serving a term in the state prison of less than life?" to which he answered "Yes, sir," was probably not proper cross-examination. However, the allowance of this question was not error sufficiently grave to warrant a reversal. Such knowledge on the part of the defendant was not essential to his guilt as a principal in the matter of the escape or attempted escape of Phelps, or to his guilt under section 109, Penal Code, in the matter of willfully assisting "any prisoner confined in any prison * * * to escape," and, this being so, we do not see how it could have otherwise prejudicially affected his cause.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

In an action to recover possession of a certificate of plaintiff's capital stock, pledged to it by its secretary as security for his note, which the secretary thereafter abstracted and pledged to defendant as security for a note, evidence held not to sustain a finding that the plaintiff's negligence and sufferance had permitted and made possible the repledge to defendant.

In an action to recover possession of its certificate of stock which had been pledged to plaintiff by its secretary, and thereafter abstracted by him and pledged to defendant as security for a note, where it appeared that the secretary, after his pledge to plaintiff, had access to the certificate; that defendant held it for over a year before demanding a transfer on plaintiff's books—the mere fact of plaintiff's trust in its secretary was not negligence estopping plaintiff from asserting a claim to the certificate as against the defendant, especially where it did not appear that defendant's position would not have been bettered if plaintiff had not permitted the secretary to possess the certificate, or had noted the pledge to it on the stub of its stock book.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by The Yamato against the Bank of Southern California. Judgment for defendant, motion for new trial overruled, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

Parker & Moote, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Lucien Gray, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover possession of 50 shares of its capital stock, alleged to be wrongfully in the possession of the defendant. The right of plaintiff's possession, as pleaded, rested in a pledge of the stock by one Inui as security for the payment of his promissory note to the plaintiff in the sum of $4,175. Inui at that time and thereafter was the secretary of the plaintiff. The defendant asserted the right to possession of the stock as collateral security for a promissory note which Inui made to it some six months after the date when the stock was pledged and delivered to plaintiff. The evidence leaves no doubt over the facts that Inui did give his promissory note to plaintiff as pleaded and secured this note by the pledge of the 50 shares of stock in question. Six months thereafter he executed his promissory note for $1,800 to defendant and pledged as security the same certificate of 50 shares of stock of plaintiff. Inui was not authorized by plaintiff to take the stock. He had not paid his debt to plaintiff. Plaintiff had not, in any way, released the pledge, and unquestionably the stock was illegally abstracted—in short, stolen—from the plaintiff and pledged with defendant. To overcome the prior and superior right of plaintiff to the possession of this stock under these circumstances defendant pleaded that plaintiff permitted Inui to retain possession of and access to the certificate of stock after it was pledged with it, "and thereby enabled said Inui to have and take and deliver said certificate of stock to this defendant"; that at the time that defendant made its loan to Inui it had no notice or knowledge of the pledge to plaintiff; that Inui—

"was the secretary of plaintiff and transacted with defendant a large amount of business for and on behalf of said plaintiff, and said Inui was at such times one of the managing officers and agents of plaintiff; that at the time of the institution of this suit, and for a long time prior thereto and for some time thereafter, said Inui was dangerously sick and ill and confined to his bed, and later died of said sickness and illness, and affiant has been unable to learn of or find or locate any property or effects of said Inui, other than said certificate of stock; that plain-iff suffered and permitted this defendant to have and continue in the peaceable and undisturbed possession of said certificate of stock from June, 1910, until November, 1911, without in any way asserting its alleged claim thereto or advising this affiant of said alleged claim, and did not assert said alleged claim to or advise this defendant thereof until after said Inui was dangerously sick and was unable to testify or participate in this controversy; that it was by the negligence and sufferance of plaintiff that the state of facts of which it now complains happened; that plaintiff ought to be and is stopped by its negligence and conduct herein in asserting a claim to said certificate of stock prejudicial to this defendant; that it is specifically provided by section 3543 of the Civil Code of this state that where one of two persons, both innocent, must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happens must be the sufferer, and this defendant pleads above acts and said provision of said Code in bar of plaintiff's alleged cause of action."

The court found in the precise language of this averment, and concluded that it was—"by the negligence and sufferance of plaintiff that the state of facts of which it complains happened, and that the plaintiff is estopped by its acts and conduct from asserting a claim to said certificate of stock pledged to plaintiff bank."

[1] The findings are here attacked for the insufficiency of the evidence to support them. They are not supported. As has been said, the evidence is abundant to establish the pledge of the stock with the plaintiff. The bank's evidence is that it had come to know Inui as "the active managing official of the company" in the matter of attending to the security and the financial matters; that he was the financial representative of the company, even to the extent of borrowing money for the company from the bank. The plea of the bank that it was induced to place reliance and trust upon the representations of Inui because of his position with plaintiff and because plaintiff intrusted him in the management of these delicate and confidential affairs would have great weight if the matter here in controversy in any way grew out of Inui's position, or was within the actual or ostensible powers of his agency. But admittedly in this matter Inui was dealing with the bank in his private personal capacity, and the bank in turn was dealing with him in a like capacity, and not at all as the representative of the plaintiff. It would be an extraordinary proposition to hold that a corporation was responsible for the private, personal acts of its officers, wholly independent of any business of the corporation, because the corporation had employed and placed these officers in positions of power and trust. True, such positions of power and trust may give the men who hold them a higher reputation for honesty and integrity than perhaps they would otherwise have, but this is very different indeed from saying that because the corporation employs them in such capacities it is in any way warranting or guaranteeing the honesty and integrity of their independent, personal business transactions, and the transaction in which Inui gave his promissory note and pledged this stock to the defendant was strictly a transaction of that character.

[2] As little foundation is there for a finding of estoppel against the plaintiff. All that appears is that Inui, the trusted secretary, had or obtained access to the safe in which the note with its collateral was deposited. He abstracted this stock and pledged it with the defendant. Plaintiff did not discover this abstraction until some time thereafter. Indeed, the bank, it appeared, held the stock for more than a year before it carried the first notification to plaintiff of its possession by a demand that it be transferred upon the books of the company; that is to say, it was in January, 1910, that the plaintiff received the stock in pledge; it was in June, 1910, that defendant received it in pledge, and in November, 1911, defendant presented the certificate to plaintiff for transfer, and thereafter plaintiff made its demand upon defendant for possession of the stock. It is not contended that plaintiff did any affirmative act touching the rights of the defendant by reason of which an estoppel could be raised in the latter's favor. Its acts are said to be acts of negligence. They are defined as negligence in not keeping possession of the certificate; negligence in permitting Inui, the debtor, to have charge of the certificate; negligence in not getting the certificate indorsed and delivered to it by Inui; negligence in not having its pledge noted on the stub of its stock book; negligence in not discovering the abstraction of the certificate; and, finally, "it was negligent in not being diligent." But all this amounts to no more than that the plaintiff trusted a man who occupied one of its responsible official positions. Every corporation and every business firm in the land must do and does the same thing. No business of any magnitude or consequence can be transacted without a trust imposed in somebody, and where a trust must be imposed it is always possible to violate the trust. It was therefore not negligence upon the part of plaintiff that it was possible for Inui, its secretary, to have stolen the pledged stock, and no other of the acts of negligence charged and found against the plaintiff amount to anything. It does not appear that defendant's position would have been bettered in the slightest if these acts or omissions of plaintiff had not taken place. It would not have enlightened defendant, for example, if the pledge to plaintiff had been noted on the stub of its stock book. It would not have advantaged defendant if plaintiff had discovered the theft of the stock the day after it was pledged to defendant, for the injury had then been accomplished. The defendant was not charged with notice that Inui had pledged it, and did not know that he had pledged it until the defendant, in turn, offered it for transfer, and defendant itself waited more than a year before so doing. Janin v. London & San Francisco

Bank, 92 Cal. 14, 27 Pac. 1100, 14 L. R. A. 320, 27 Am. St. Rep. 82. No evidence whatever was offered from which even an inference could be drawn that knowledge acquired by the bank at any time after the contract of pledge was completed would have enabled it to have bettered its financial condition in the matter of the Inui loan.

[3, 4] Appellant served and filed its notice of intention to move for a new trial on August 12, 1912. This was prior to the entry of the judgment. Thereafter, on the 14th day of August, 1912, the judgment was entered, and upon August 23d appellant served a new notice of intention to move for a new trial. Appellant's first notice of intention filed prior to the entry of the judgment was premature and a nullity. Its second notice of intention, served and filed upon August 23d, was within 10 days after the entry of the judgment, and therefore from any point of view, whether or not appellant had notice of the entry, was within time. Section 659, Code Civ. Proc. This precise question has not heretofore been passed upon by this court, but has received consideration in Montana under a Code section identical with ours, and we are in accord with the views of the Montana court in its construction of the statute. That is to say, the first notice was premature and a nullity, since the judgment had not been entered. Power v. Turner, 37 Mont. 521, 97 Pac. 950. And though formal notice of the entry of the judgment may be waived by the moving party by instituting his proceedings in support of the motion, without such notice, as was here done under the second notice of intention, it will not be held that the mere fact that a premature notice was inadvertently given is a waiver such as will compel the appellant to stand upon the premature notice and forbid him giving a later and proper one. McIntyre v. MacGinniss, 41 Mont. 87, 108 Pac. 353, 137 Am. St. Rep. 701.

The judgment and ordered appealed from are therefore reversed.

1. WILLS ⚭55—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In a proceeding to revoke the probate of a will of a man 84 years old, executed by him on his deathbed while very feeble, evidence held to support a finding of testamentary capacity.

2. WILLS ⚭108—EXECUTION—INDICATION OF DESIRES BY SIGNS.

3. WILLS ⚭302—EXECUTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

5. WILLS ⚭47—TESTAMENTARY CAPACITY—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

6. WILLS ⚭166—UNDUE INFLUENCE—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

7. WILLS ⚭155—VALIDITY—UNDUE INFLUENCE.

To render a will invalid on the ground of undue influence, there must be that sort of pressure which overpowers the mind and masters the volition of the testator at the very moment of the testamentary act.

8. WILLS ⚭111—EXECUTION—SIGNATURE BY MARK.

Where a testator attempted to sign his name to a will, but, being unable to control the pen or pencil, indicated a desire to have his name signed for him, whereupon some one guided his hand in making a cross, and his name was written by the attorney who drew the will, the fact that the mechanical work of affixing his name to the will was performed by another did not invalidate the instrument.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

Proceeding by Elizabeth Johnson Travis and others against Florence Straus, to revoke the probate of the will of Robert Clark, deceased. From an order refusing to revoke the probate, the petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Frank R. Wehe and C. S. Morbio, both of San Francisco, for appellants. J. W. Henderson and F. J. Kierce, both of San Francisco (F. J. Kierce, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal by certain nephews and nieces of Robert Clark, deceased, from an order of the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco refusing to revoke the probate of the will of said Clark.

The proponent and executrix of the last will of said Clark is also a niece. All of the petitioners reside outside of the state of California. Florence Straus, executrix of the will and respondent here, is and long has been a resident of Los Angeles. Appellants frankly admit that there was a serious conflict of evidence at the hearing of the petition for revocation of the probate of the will, but they ask a reversal of the order denying their prayer upon the ground that, in any aspect of the evidence, it was totally inadequate to support the conclusion reached by the probate court.

The three grounds of the contest by appellants were: (1) That the will was procured by fraud and undue influence; (2) that at the time of executing the will the testator lacked testamentary capacity; and (3) that the will was not executed according to law.

[1] The court found against all of these grounds of contest. The finding with reference to the affectionate regard in which the testator held his niece Mrs. Straus so thoroughly and briefly sums up the testimony of the witnesses who appeared for the respondent that we need do no more than quote it. The court found:

"That said Florence Straus is a niece of said Robert Clark, and the only one of his heirs residing in the state of California; that said Robert Clark held the said Florence Straus in affectionate regard, and upon the death of his wife, Mary Clark, about three weeks previous to his own death, the said Robert Clark sent a telegram to the said Florence Straus, who resided in the city of Los Angeles, state of California, advising her of the death of his said wife, and asking her to come to him at once; that said Florence Straus immediately came to San Francisco, and remained with the said Robert Clark, until his death; that the said Robert Clark did, shortly after her arrival, cause the money on deposit in the said German Savings Bank & Loan Society to be deposited in the names of Robert Clark and Florence Straus and made the same payable to the order of either or the survivor of either; that on the 13th day of April, 1912, said Robert Clark became ill, and on the 15th day of April, 1912, for the purpose of better caring for him, the said Robert Clark was, by order of his physician, removed to the Hahnemann Hospital, in which he remained until his death."

The money to which reference is made in the foregoing finding was something more than $13,000 in the aggregate.

Robert Clark, at the time of his death, was 84 years of age, yet, according to the testimony of even some of the witnesses for the contestants, he was in good health for a man of his years up to a time within a few days of his death. On April 14, 1912, he received notice from the board of health that certain debris in the cellar of his house must be taken out and burned. He personally removed some of this material. He then took a seat on a piece of wood or block in his back yard, and after sitting there for a short time he collapsed and sunk into a fainting condition, from which he was revived with difficulty by the neighbors who carried him into the house. On April 15th, by order of his physician, he was removed to Hahnemann Hospital, where on the evening of that day, between 5 and 6 o'clock, the instrument afterwards admitted to probate as his will was executed. He died shortly after 9 o'clock the following morning.

The will was prepared by Mr. J. W. Henderson, an attorney at law, who testified that he first met Robert Clark about three weeks prior to the latter's death. Mrs. Straus had asked Mr. Henderson to see her uncle with reference to his wife's estate. After some discussion of the affairs of Mrs. Clark's estate and of the threatened action on the part of some of Mr. Clark's relatives to have a guardian appointed for the old man, the attorney, at his client's request, asked Mrs. Straus to leave the room. They then discussed the disposition of Mr. Clark's own property, and Mr. Henderson advised the execution of a will rather than any arrangement for the passing of title by deed. Of this interview Mr. Henderson testified, in part, as follows:

"I asked him about the way he would like to have his will prepared, and he said he would like to have it go to Mrs. Straus. He was definite about it. I told him that if he desired the will that way I would prepare the will and bring it out to him for execution. He said, 'Not now.' I asked him when he wanted to do it. He said: 'After a while; I am not going to die yet.' I did not press him any further about it. I said nothing further about that matter."

After Mr. Clark was taken to the hospital, Mr. Henderson was notified of that fact by a telephone message either from Mrs. Straus or from the attending physician, and, after preparing a will in accordance with the wishes expressed by Mr. Clark regarding the disposition of his property when he should be ready to make a will, the attorney, accompanied by Mr. Botts, a gentleman connected with his office, went to see the sick man. After Mr. Henderson entered the room of Mr. Clark, the invalid spoke to him, smiled, and grasped his hand. Asked by the lawyer how they were "using" him at the hospital, he said, "All right," or something of that kind. Asked if he wanted to make his will, Mr. Clark said, "No," very emphatically. "I called his attention," said Mr. Henderson, "to the fact that he was very ill, and that if he was going to make a will at all he had better consider it now. I did not say anything further regarding it. I stepped back because I did not care to press anybody to make a will. The doctor stated to him then that he was a very sick man, and that he possibly had not 48 hours to live; that if he had any business to transact, that he desired to transact before his death, he would advise him to do so now; that, while he might live longer than that and might recover and be well again, he could not assure him that he would. This seemed to have some influence on the old gentleman's mind, and I again asked him if he desired, under those circumstances, to execute the will in accordance with our conversation. I told him that I had prepared the will in accordance with his desire expressed to me at his home. He said then that he desired to make his will." The will was then read to him, and he was raised up, a book was placed in front of him, and he attempted to sign his name to the will which was put thereon. He seemed to be unable to control the pen which had been placed in his hand, and a pencil was substituted, but with no better results. Mr. Henderson then asked if he desired to have his name signed for him, and he indicated a desire to have that done. Some one guided his hand in making a cross, and the name "Robert Clark" was written by Mr. Henderson. According to Mr. Henderson's testimony, testator declared the instrument to be his will, and at his request Mr. Botts and Mr. Henderson signed it as witnesses with due formality. Mr. Henderson testified that Robert Clark was of sound mind at the time of executing the instrument. He was corroborated in nearly all of the essential particulars of his account of the occurrences in Robert Clark's room at the hospital by Mr. Botts, Mrs. Straus, and Dr. Freyermuth. It would serve no good purpose to quote or to summarize their testimony further, except to discuss portions of the physician's account of the mental condition of his patient at the time of the signing of the will, because appellants insist that his testimony indicates clearly a state of incompetence on the part of the testator to express any wish concerning the disposition of the property.

[2, 3] It is true that, according to the account of the witnesses who had stood at the bedside, some of Mr. Clark's wishes were expressed by affirmative signs made in response to questions, but this fact does not invalidate the will. A will made by interrogatories may be valid (Williams on Executors [7th Ed.] p. 57; 1 Underhill on Wills, § 204; Denny v. Pinney's Heirs, 60 Vt. 524, 12 Atl. 108; Robbins v. Robbins, 50 N. J. Eq. 742, 26 Atl. 673); and, while it is true that where a will has been so made the court will always use care to require proof of spontaneous action and volition on the part of the testator, we cannot say that in this case the conclusion reached was not justified.

Dr. Freyermuth, who had attended Mrs. Clark, had told him at the time of her death when the aged man was downcast that he had ten years to live. When the doctor spoke to his patient in the hospital and advised him to make some disposition of the property, he did not care to sign any will then, perhaps having in mind the physician's former assurance of a long life. However, the doctor told him that he was a very sick man, and that the morrow might be too late. Then, according to the physician's testimony, Mr. Henderson asked Mr. Clark if he wished to sign the will as he had prepared it. So it was read aloud to the testator, section by section, very distinctly. Mr. Henderson asked him if that was what he wanted, and he nodded and spoke, "Yes." The physician's account of the sick man's efforts to affix his name to the instrument and the subsequent signing of the will by Mr. Henderson agree substantially with the testimony of the other witnesses. In answer to the usual question, "Was he of sound or unsound mind at that time in your judgment," the physician said, "He was absolutely of sound mind." The doctor stated further that, at that time, his patient's mental condition was unimpaired; that Mr. Clark was rational; and that after he had been brought to the hospital, and before the execution of the will, the condition of the old man improved slightly. It also developed in the examination of Dr. Freyermuth that frequently before the witness had ever met Mrs. Straus, and notably on an occasion shortly after Mrs. Clark's death, Mr. Clark had said that he wanted "Florence" (Mrs. Straus) to have his property. Appellants assert that all of the physician's testimony on direct examination was nullified by his admission on cross-examination that his patient was in a "partially semicomatose condition," after he had been taken to the hospital. But this testimony was quite consistent with Dr. Freyermuth's other statements, because he did not testify that the state of partial coma continued during all of the time between the arrival of the patient at the hospital and his death.

[4, 5] That testator was an old man and a very feeble man there can be no doubt, but we cannot say, as matter of law, that, in view of the testimony in all of its bearings, he was lacking in testamentary capacity. The burden of proving unsoundness of mind was on the contestants. Estate of Dolbeer, 149 Cal. 230, 86 Pac. 695, 9 Ann. Cas. 795. The infirmities of old age were not sufficient in themselves to establish lack of testamentary capacity (Estate of MacCrellish, 167 Cal. 717, 141 Pac. 257, L. R. A. 1915A, 443); and, in view of the positive testimony of the witnesses who saw the execution of the will that Mr. Clark was of sound and disposing mind, we think the finding of the court on that subject was amply supported.

[6, 7] Nor can we agree with appellants in their argument in support of their theory that, under the evidence, the will must have been procured by fraud and undue influence. It is not an unnatural will. It followed the contemplated disposition of his property which the testator had discussed with his physician and his legal adviser. Mrs. Straus was the one person for whom he sent when his wife died, and after he was taken to the hospital, as the attending nurse testified, he was somewhat impatient until Mrs. Straus arrived, but after her advent he became quiet and apparently contented.

Much appears in the briefs of appellants on the subject of the alleged persuasions and importunities of the doctor and the attorney which, it is affirmed, must have amounted to undue influence upon the mind and volition of the testator. The evidence falls far short of establishing that sort of sinister influence which sometimes operates to produce an instrument which is not the will of its supposed maker. These gentlemen were Robert Clark's advisers. The mere advice to make a will which they gave to the old man, instead of exhibiting a desire to defraud, cajole, or mislead him, would rather indicate a laudable wish that he who was the client of one and the patient of the other, should put his affairs in order before his departure from this world, which in the nature of things could not be long postponed for a man of his age and infirmity. It can hardly be said, in view of the evidence, that these witnesses must have been co-conspirators of Mrs. Straus, trying to aid her in snatching her uncle's fortune from his other kindred. It was shown that she met them both after her aunt's death, when she came from Los Angeles in answer to her uncle's summons. When Mr. Clark wanted an adviser to aid him in the settlement of his wife's estate, Mrs. Straus was directed to Mr. Henderson by the widow of the former pastor of the church which her aunt had attended. She herself swore that she had never importuned her uncle to make a will in her favor. The fact that advice was offered to Mr. Clark, taken in connection with the activity of Mrs. Straus in securing counsel for him, fails to establish that sort of undue influence which must be shown before a court will overthrow a solemnly executed will. The evidence utterly fails to reach the dignity of proof of that sort of pressure which overpowered the mind and mastered the volition of the testator at the very moment of the testamentary act. Without such proof, no will should be held invalid on the ground of undue influence. Estate of Gleason, 164 Cal. 756, 130 Pac. 872; Estate of Carithers, 156 Cal. 428, 105 Pac. 127; Estate of Lavinburg, 161 Cal. 543, 119 Pac. 915; Estate of Kilborn, 162 Cal. 11, 120 Pac. 762.

[8] There was ample testimony to support the finding of due execution of the will, including the declaration, which Mr. Henderson said the testator made, that the instrument subsequently probated was his last will. Neither the fact that testator made his wishes known partly by pantomime and partly in answer to questions, nor the circumstance that the mechanical work of affixing his name to the will was performed by another, serves to invalidate the instrument. In re Mullin, 110 Cal. 258, 42 Pac. 645.

In accordance with the views expressed above, we are of the opinion that the decision of the superior court and the order made and the decree entered were without substantial error.

The order is affirmed

In re BOLLINGER'S ESTATE. (S. F. 7069.)
(Supreme Court of California. June 8, 1915.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚡262—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—PRESUMPTION.

Property in the possession of either spouse at the time of death is presumed to be community property.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚡264—WIFE'S SEPARATE PROPERTY — SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

On a widow's appeal from a decree distributing her deceased husband's estate to his three children by a former marriage, uncontradicted testimony of a surviving son that the real property had been acquired and was owned by the deceased prior to his last marriage, and that he thereafter kept the property as his own, supported a conclusion that all of the property of the estate was the testator's separate property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 916; Dec. Dig. ⚡264.]

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚡263 — COMMUNITY PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

On a widow's appeal from the distribution of her deceased husband's estate, evidence that the real property involved had been acquired and owned by decedent prior to his marriage, and had been kept as his own, was relevant on the issue whether it was community property and the mere fact that it was oral did not render it inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 915; Dec. Dig. ⚡263.]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR ⚡231 — OBJECTION BELOW—SUFFICIENCY.

Where the objection stated to relevant evidence was merely that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, it will not permit complaint on appeal that it was hearsay and merely the conclusion of the witness, and not the best evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1299, 1352; Dec. Dig. ⚡231.]

5. HUSBAND AND WIFE ⚡263 — COMMUNITY PROPERTY—EVIDENCE.

On the issue whether a decedent's property was community property, an agreement of the surviving wife, in which for a valuable consideration she absolutely waived and released the decedent from all claims and demands, executed a short time before decedent's death, was admissible to show that there had been negotiations in respect to property rights between decedent and herself before decedent's action for divorce was instituted, and that in such negotiations there had been no mention of community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Husband and Wife, Cent. Dig. § 915; Dec. Dig. ⚡263.]

6. DIVORCE ⚡254 — PROPERTY RIGHTS — DECREE.

In a husband's action for divorce, alleging that there was no community property, and where there had been no appeal from the interlocutory judgment, the finding and the decree, reciting that there was no community property, irrevocably settled the property rights after the expiration of the six months allowed by Civ. Code, § 131, for appeal from the entry of the interlocutory decree.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 718-721; Dec. Dig. ⚡254.]

7. DIVORCE ⚡254—COMMUNITY PROPERTY—ALLEGATION AND FINDING.

An allegation in a husband's complaint for divorce that there was no community property even though a mere conclusion, is sufficient, if proved upon issue joined, to support a finding that there was no community property.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 718-721; Dec. Dig. ⚡254.]

8. DIVORCE ⚡254—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—OBJECTION TO PLEADING—WAIVER.

In an action for divorce, wherein the wife did not demur to the complaint, alleging that there was no community property, she could not, for the first time, collaterally raise the question that the finding of the nonexistence of community property was a conclusion of law on appeal from the decree of distribution in her deceased husband's estate.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William S. Wells, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of Samuel Pierce Bollinger, deceased. From a decree distributing the estate to the three children of decedent by a former marriage, Emma C. Bollinger, widow, appeals. Affirmed.

L. H. Honey, of Angeles Camp, J. G. Reisner, of San Francisco, H. W. Brunk, of Berkeley, and Wm. O. Minor, of Oakland, for appellant. F. I. Lemos, of Hayward, and Philip M. Carey, of Oakland, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. Emma C. Bollinger, widow of Samuel Pierce Bollinger, appeals from a decree distributing his estate to his three children by a former marriage, who are the legatees and devisees mentioned in his will.

[1, 2] Appellant contends that the evidence before the probate court was not sufficient to overcome the presumption that all property in the possession of the testator at the time of his death was community property. Conceding that the presumption which appellant invokes does attend the possession of property by either spouse (Meyer v. Kinzer, 12 Cal. 253, 73 Am. Dec. 538; In re Bauer, 79 Cal. 308, 21 Pac. 759), such presumption is a disputable one (Freese v. Hibernia Sav. & Loan Society, 139 Cal. 394, 73 Pac. 172), and in the present proceeding the proof was clear and ample that Mrs. Bollinger had no community interest in the property of which her husband was possessed at the time of his death.

The court's conclusion that all of the property of the estate was testator's separate property was supported by the testimony of one of his sons, who swore that the real property involved in this dispute was owned by his father prior to the latter's marriage to Emma C. Bollinger. The son also testified that at the time of his father's marriage to Emma C. Bollinger the former was worth $18,000 or $20,000, with the real estate; that all of this property was acquired by the father of the witness before his marriage; that he did not become insolvent after marriage; and that he kept the property as his own. (At the time of testator's death the estate was valued at $12,670.80.) The testimony of this surviving son was uncontradicted.

[3, 4] To appellant's statement that this evidence was hearsay, containing merely conclusions of the witness, and not the best evidence, respondents reply that no such points were made at the hearing, counsel for appellant contenting themselves with the stock objection that the testimony sought was "incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial." We think this answer is sufficient. The evidence was clearly pertinent to the issue involved, and if objectionable in the form in which it was offered, the ground of objection should have been clearly specified. The mere fact that it was oral did not render it inadmissible. Killian v. Killian, 10 Cal. App. 318, 101 Pac. 806.

[5] There was also introduced at the hearing of the petition for distribution a document, regularly acknowledged by Emma C. Bollinger, whereby for valuable considerations she admitted full payment, satisfaction, settlement, and adjustment of all claims and demands of every description against Samuel P. Bollinger. The acquittance also contained this language:

"I do hereby waive and surrender, release and acquit said Samuel P. Bollinger from any and all claim, demand, obligation and indebtedness, in the present or future from or on account of any reason, cause or condition, judgment or decree, by reason of anything that has happened between us or rising or growing therefrom, absolutely and unconditionally."

This instrument was dated less than a month prior to the death of Mr. Bollinger. Appellant construes this writing as a waiver of claims against her husband personally and not as a disclaimer of all interest in his estate, citing in this behalf Jones v. Lamont, 118 Cal. 499, 50 Pac. 766, 62 Am. St. Rep. 251. Courts have been unwilling to extend the scope of releases of this sort in such manner as to hold them applicable to community property in contests arising, not in actions for divorce, but in probate proceedings, and if the finding with respect to such property in the proceeding before us were based upon a construction of the contract of waiver alone, we would probably reverse the judgment. But we need not construe the language of the agreement at all. It was admissible in evidence as a part of the showing that there had been negotiations with respect to property rights between Mr. Bollinger and his wife before the action for divorce was instituted, and that in those negotiations there had been no mention of community property. For this limited and negative purpose the contract was relevant and material.

[6] But if there could be any doubt of the sufficiency of the evidence heretofore discussed, to support the award of all the property according to the terms of the will, it would be dispelled upon inspection of the pleadings, findings, and judgment in the divorce action which were introduced in evidence at the hearing in the probate court. In his complaint for divorce Mr. Bollinger alleged that there was no community property belonging to the parties to the action. The answer of Mrs. Bollinger was a mere general denial. The court found and the decree recited that there was no community property. The testator died in less than three weeks after the entry of the interlocutory decree. As no evidence that there had been any appeal from the interlocutory judgment was offered, we must hold that the property rights had become finally and irrevocably settled upon the expiration of six months from the entry of the interlocutory decree. Section 131, Civ. Code; Huneke v. Huneke, 12 Cal. App. 199, 107 Pac. 131.

[7] But appellant's counsel say that the allegation that there was "no community property belonging to the parties to this action" was the statement of a mere conclusion of law; that the finding based upon such conclusion of law was of no force; that in the absence of any issue as to property rights, the divorce action abated upon the death of plaintiff, and that the property rights must be settled by subsequent proceedings. This contention is without merit. An averment that one spouse took title to property as community property is sufficient upon issue joined, if proved, to support a finding to that effect, and an allegation that there was no community property would, under like circumstances, support a negative finding such as we have in this case. Killian v. Killian, supra.

[8] But even if we concede that the finding of the nonexistence of community property is really a conclusion of law, appellant, who did not demur to the complaint, but joined issue on all of the allegations thereof, may not raise the question for the first time in this court.

HICKMAN et al. v. LYNCH et al. (Civ. 1616.)

DISMISSAL AND NONSUIT $\S$ 60 — WANT OF PROSECUTION.

Under Code Civ. Proc. $\S$ 583, providing that any action shall be dismissed on motion of the defendant, or by the court on its own motion, unless brought to trial, within 5 years after the filing of the answer, where 2½ years after the answer motion was made to set the cause for trial, and, pending hearing, the defendants asked permission to interpose a cross-complaint, which was granted after resistance by the plaintiffs, and the cross-complaint filed, to which plaintiffs answered, judgment for the plaintiffs, rendered 3 years after filing of the cross-complaint, more than 5 years after the filing of the answer, could stand, the court not having lost jurisdiction of the cause under the statute, since it had not been finally at issue for 5 years, but only for 3 years, the delay in bringing the case to trial having been caused in part by the cross-complaint, while by it the defendants became actors in the case, and chargeable in part with bringing it on for trial.

Appeal from Superior Court City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by N. H. Hickman and others against M. C. Lynch and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. H. Chapman, Wm. M. Abbott, Wm. M. Cannon, and Powell & Dow, all of San Francisco, for appellants. H. M. Anthony, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was one to recover money for goods sold and delivered. Some 2½ years after defendants' answer to the complaint was filed a notice of motion was made to set the cause for trial, and, pending the hearing of the motion, the defendants asked permission to interpose a cross-complaint. That permission was granted after the application had been resisted by the plaintiffs. The cross-complaint was filed, and a demurrer interposed to it was eventually overruled. Plaintiffs answered the cross-complaint. It also appears that the plaintiffs made an effort for trial and tried. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and also against the defendants on the cross-complaint; and the only point made now in support of the defendants' appeal is that before the trial of the action the court had lost jurisdiction of the cause by reason of the fact that plaintiffs failed to prosecute it to trial within five years after the defendants' answer to the original complaint had been filed, as required by section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

Conceding the defendants' construction of the statute to be correct, nevertheless it appears that the case at bar was not fully and finally at issue for five years, but only for a period of three years; and the delay in bringing it to trial for over five years after answer filed is attributable in part to the action of the defendants in asking for and being granted permission to file a cross-complaint. It also appears that the plaintiff made an effort to have the cause placed upon the calendar for trial within 2½ years after the original answer of the defendants had been filed, and that this cause would, in all probability, have been brought on for trial if it had not been for the intervention of the defendants. Under these circumstances there is no merit in the contention that the court lost jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the action. The appellants of course rely upon a literal interpretation of the section referred to, which provides that the court must dismiss if the action is pending untried for a period of five years after the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's complaint has been filed. But upon the filing of the cross-complaint in the present case the defendants became aggressive and interested actors in the presentation of at least one phase of the case, and therefore they were charged in part with the duty of bringing the case on for trial. Jacot et al. v. Marks, 26 Misc. Rep. 670, 57 N. Y. Supp. 904.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; Geo. H. Buck, Judge.

Action by J. F. Pankewicz against Clara A. Jess, as recorder of Daly City, and others. From a judgment of dismissal as to certain defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph T. Curley and Joseph Rafael, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Albert Mansfield, of Redwood City, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for damages for false imprisonment. The amended complaint alleges that Clara A. Jess was the recorder of Daly City; that the defendant J. H. Mansfield was the sheriff of San Mateo county; and that the American Bonding Company was surety on the bond of said sheriff. The complaint further alleges that on a certain date Clara A. Jess, as recorder, adjudged the plaintiff guilty of contempt of court, in that he, as marshal of Daly City, willfully and unlawfully neglected and refused to serve a warrant issued by the recorder's court in a certain criminal case, in which the defendant therein was charged with felony; whereupon said recorder sentenced the plaintiff to pay a fine of $50, or, in default thereof, to be imprisoned in the county jail for one day. It is also alleged that Mansfield, the sheriff, acting upon the commitment placed in his hands by said recorder, against the will and consent of the plaintiff, took him into custody and imprisoned him in the county jail for one day. In consequence of this imprisonment plaintiff claims damages in the sum of $25,000 for injury to his good name, to his credit, and to his reputation as marshal.

To the complaint each of the defendants interposed a general and special demurrer. The demurrer of Clara A. Jess was overruled, but the demurrers of the other defendants were sustained, and a judgment of dismissal as to them was duly entered, from which judgment this appeal is taken.

These demurrers were alike, and will be discussed together.

[1] It is conceded that the provisions of the Code applicable to justices' courts are also applicable to recorders' courts. A "warrant" is a process issued in the name of the state, directed to any sheriff, constable, marshal, or policeman, commanding him to arrest and take into custody the named defendant. Pen. Code, § 1427. The failure to serve a warrant issued by a recorder's court, it appears, would be disobedience of a lawful order of the court, and hence a contempt thereof, for which the officer so disobeying might be punished as provided by law. Code Civ. Proc. § 906, subd. 3.

[2-5] An officer whose duty it is to serve process is bound to serve the same when such process is regular on its face. Process is said to be regular on its face when it proceeds from a court, officer, or body having authority of law to issue process of that nature, and which is legal in form, and contains nothing to notify or fairly apprise any one that it is issued without authority. Thompson v. Laughlin, 91 Cal. 313, 27 Pac. 752; Brichman v. Ross, 67 Cal. 601, 8 Pac. 316; 19 Cyc. 343; 2 Cooley on Torts, p. 1480; section 4168, Pol. Code. When lack of authority is apparent the officer is not only justified, but it is his duty, not to serve the illegal process; and, if he does so, it is at his peril. The only ground, therefore, upon which an action can be predicated against an officer for executing process is where the lack of authority for its issuance is apparent on its face. It may be that in an action for false imprisonment the mere allegation, standing alone, that the plaintiff had been imprisoned without warrant or authority and against his will, would be a sufficient statement of a cause of action; but where, as here, the complaint shows that the imprisonment was made under a warrant, it is the duty of the plaintiff to set out in his complaint the fact that such warrant was irregular on its face. Barker v. Anderson, 81 Mich. 508, 45 N. W. 1108; 19 Cyc. 357; Barfield v. Turner, 101 N. C. 357, 8 S. E. 115. Every allegation in the complaint in the present case may be true, and yet it may be equally true that the arrest of the plaintiff was upon a warrant regular upon its face.

For the reasons stated, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

1. MANDAMUS $\Leftrightarrow$ 51—ENTRY OF FINAL JUDGMENT—DIVORCE.

Under Civ. Code, § 132, providing that final judgment in a divorce action may be entered by the court after the expiration of one year from the entry of the interlocutory judgment, on motion of either party or upon its own motion, the writ of mandate may issue at the instance of the plaintiff to require that the court grant a final decree after one year from the entry of an interlocutory decree from which no appeal has been taken.

2. DIVORCE ☞170 — “INTERLOCUTORY DECREE”—EFFECT.

The function of an “interlocutory decree” includes not only the establishment of the party's right to a divorce, but also includes the hearing and final determination of the rights of the parties as to property, or the matter of provision for the wife's support, and, if no appeal is taken, such decree becomes final with respect to the adjudged right to divorce and as to such property rights.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 552, 553; Dec. Dig. ☞170.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interlocutory Decree.]

3. MANDAMUS ☞51—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—DIVORCE—INTERLOCUTORY AND FINAL DECREE—STATUTES.

Under Civ. Code, § 132, providing that after a year from the entry of an interlocutory judgment the court, on motion of either party or upon its own motion, may enter a final decree of divorce, and that, if an appeal is taken, final judgment shall not be entered until such appeal has been finally disposed of, and not then if the judgment has been reversed, a writ of mandate would not lie to compel the judge of the superior court to enter a final decree of divorce after one year from the entry of the interlocutory judgment, where an appeal from the interlocutory judgment was pending.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 98-100; Dec. Dig. ☞51.]

Petition by Wm. D. Newell for writ of mandate against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Los Angeles and Chas. Monroe, Judge thereof. Petition denied, and proceeding dismissed.

Earl Curtis Peck, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Frank P. Doherty, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner has applied to this court for a writ of mandate to compel the entry of a final decree of divorce in an action wherein Kate E. Newell is plaintiff and the petitioner, William D. Newell, is defendant. On the 18th day of November, 1912, in the superior court of Los Angeles county, an interlocutory judgment was entered in said action whereby it was determined that the plaintiff was entitled to a divorce, and it was ordered that the defendant pay to the plaintiff a certain monthly allowance for her maintenance and support until the further order of the court. Immediately thereafter the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court from that portion of the interlocutory decree which provided for the maintenance and support of the plaintiff. That appeal is pending in this court pursuant to an order of transfer from the Supreme Court.

In response to an alternative writ issued in this proceeding, the respondent judge of the superior court states that, on the 30th day of November, 1914, he denied the motion of petitioner for entry of a final decree of divorce in said action, and that such denial was on the ground that an appeal from the interlocutory decree of divorce was at that time pending and undetermined.

[1] It is settled that after the expiration of a year from the entry of the interlocutory decree in a divorce action, and where no appeal has been taken, the writ of mandate may issue at the instance of the plaintiff to require that the court grant the final decree. Claudius v. Melvin, 146 Cal. 257, 79 Pac. 897. For the purposes of this decision we will assume that the same rule exists in favor of the defendant against whom the decree of divorce has been granted; although it is somewhat anomalous that the wrongdoer in an action in equity should be permitted to demand affirmative relief and compel the court to visit upon him the legal consequences of his wrongful acts. It is nevertheless true that the Code has provided that the final decree may be entered by the court “on motion of either party, or upon its own motion.” Civ. Code, § 132. But it is also provided in the same section that:

“If any appeal is taken from the interlocutory judgment or motion for a new trial made, final judgment shall not be entered until such motion or appeal has been finally disposed of, nor then, if the motion has been granted or judgment reversed.”

[2] It has been determined that in a divorce action under the provisions of our Code the function of an interlocutory decree includes not only the establishment of the right of a party to a divorce, but includes also the hearing and final determination of the rights of the parties as to property. Any disposition of property rights made in connection with the hearing of the principal cause of action is regularly included in and becomes a part of the interlocutory decree. If no appeal be taken, such decree becomes final with respect to those property rights, as well as with respect to the adjudged right to a divorce. Huneke v. Huneke, 12 Cal. App. 199, 203, 107 Pac. 131; Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107. Necessarily the same consequence follows where the court takes into consideration and includes in its interlocutory decree the matter of provision for the support of the wife.

[3] In the present case there is an interlocutory judgment which has become final with respect to the plaintiff's right to a divorce, but is subject to a pending appeal affecting the provisions made therein for the support of the plaintiff. Until the determination of that appeal the superior court is not in a position to know whether it will be required to make some other and different order affecting a matter closely connected with the granting of the divorce. “There is no doubt that a superior court may be compelled by mandamus to proceed, in regular course, to the trial of a cause, when without any legal reason it flatly refuses to do so. But the writ can be used for this purpose only when the action of the lower court is a plain refusal to perform a clear duty which the law specially enjoins; and the party invoking its aid must show a case where the duty of the court to do the thing asked is pure and simple, and unmixed with discretionary power or the exercise of judgment." Tomkin v. Harris, 90 Cal. 201, 27 Pac. 202. The provision contained in section 132, Civil Code, postponing the entry of final judgment until after final disposition of any appeal from the interlocutory judgment, was adopted in recognition of the fact that in granting a divorce the court has a variety of duties to perform affecting the property rights of the parties and the future welfare of those parties and their children; and it was deemed advisable that in such cases all of those matters, as far as possible, should be finally adjusted in connection with the granting of a divorce.

The application of petitioner for a peremptory writ of mandate is denied, and the proceeding is dismissed.

I concur in the judgment: SHAW, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Ed Mallicoat was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

L. E. Dadmun, of San Diego, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of murder of the second degree, and sentenced to serve a term of ten years in the penitentiary. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

In August, 1914, four privates in the marine corps of the United States government went from their post on North Island, in San Diego county, to the city of San Diego. They arrived in the latter city during the course of the afternoon and spent their time variously at certain saloons and other resorts. By the hour of 11 o'clock in the evening they had imbibed considerable liquor, but, so far as the evidence shows, were not greatly intoxicated. While enjoying themselves in one of the saloons which they visited, they were approached by a civilian who was intoxicated and who desired to make one of their party. A marine named Brinton, being one of the four, testified that he took charge of the civilian and led him away, intending to take him to his room. While on the street, and while conducting the civilian therealong, he was stopped by appellant, who was a special police officer engaged as a chauffeur for the police department of the city of San Diego. Some articles from the pockets of the civilian were in the hands of Brinton at that time, Brinton claiming that the civilian had handed them to him, while the defendant in his testimony said that he had observed Brinton taking the articles from the pockets of the intoxicated man. At any rate, Brinton was required by appellant to cease conducting the civilian farther, and the latter was left in charge of appellant, while Brinton returned to the saloon and rejoined his companions. After disposing of the civilian, appellant was proceeding on his way toward the police station, when he was overtaken by the four marines. Appellant testified that the marines came running after him, while Brinton's testimony was that it was time for them to catch their boat for North Island, and that they were traveling up the street for the purpose of reaching the ferry. Two of the marines, Brinton and a man named Collier, were in front, and several paces behind them came the two remaining men of the squad. Brinton and Collier approached within a distance sometimes stated in the testimony as being about 15 feet of appellant, who turned and observed them. From this point in the narrative of the occurrence there is some conflict between the testimony given for the prosecution and that of the defendant. The marine Brinton testified that, as they got within about 15 feet of appellant, the latter drew his gun and that Collier said to him, "I ain't afraid of your old gun"; that at that moment appellant fired a shot from his revolver and Collier dropped to the sidewalk with a bullet through his abdomen, from which wound he shortly thereafter died. The appellant's testimony was to the effect that the foremost men advanced upon him in a threatening manner, with arms upraised in a fighting attitude, and that those in the rear were running up at the same time, and that, believing that he was about to be mobbed, he fired, with the effect noted. There was testimony of another witness that immediately after the shooting appellant was heard to say: "If any more fools with me I will shoot them, too." There was also testimony as contradicting that of appellant wherein he said that the men were advancing upon him in a threatening manner; this testimony was that the marines were not so doing, but had their hands at their sides.

[1-4] Counsel first argues that it was error for the court to deny appellant's motion for a new trial because the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and he asserts the trial judge stated it as his opinion that a different verdict should have been rendered. He states that it requires an agreement of 13 men to make a verdict of guilty effectual, namely, the 12 jurors in the box and the judge on the bench, and that a verdict returned by the jury must be set aside and a new trial granted unless the court wholly agrees with the jury as to its conclusion. The trial judge, in passing upon a defendant's motion for a new trial in a criminal case, is called upon to determine whether there is evidence sufficient to support the verdict. All questions of fact being primarily for the jury, this judgment of the court is not to be exercised in such a captious and overcritical way as to nullify a verdict which rests upon substantial evidence given by credible witnesses, and the mere intimation of the trial judge that, had he been a jurymen, he probably would have voted for an acquittal, is not sufficient. The judge should, in order to warrant an order for a new trial to be made, believe that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence and that, if allowed to stand, it would result in unjust punishment being inflicted. So believing, it becomes his imperative duty to order a new trial. An order made either granting or denying such new trial will not be disturbed unless an abuse of discretion is made manifest. People v. Knutte, 111 Cal. 453, 44 Pac. 166; People v. Chew Wing Gow, 120 Cal. 298, 52 Pac. 657; People v. Tapia, 131 Cal. 647, 63 Pac. 1001; People v. Elmore, 167 Cal. 205, 138 Pac. 989. It is urged here that from the remarks made by the trial judge at the time the ruling on the motion for a new trial was entered he was of the view that the verdict as rendered was improper. The argument of the judge as showing the reasons which impelled him to make the order complained of is not proper to be considered here. People v. Tapia, supra. But, were we authorized to examine into the argument so expressed, nothing can be found therein inconsistent with the view that the judge concluded that the verdict found sufficient support in the evidence. The judge in one part of his statement expressly declared that there was evidence sufficient to warrant all of the findings of the jury, and with that conclusion no fault can be found, if the entire record of the evidence is examined.

[5] Complaint is next made because the district attorney was allowed to cross-examine the witness introduced on behalf of the prosecution in an attempt to show that this witness had made statements differing from those given in his testimony on a prior occasion. On the ground that he was surprised by the testimony of the witness, the district attorney was allowed considerable latitude in the direction suggested. This witness was a police officer who assumed to relate a statement made by the deceased as a dying declaration. He testified that when asked why the defendant had shot him deceased had said: "He had some trouble with a friend of mine." This statement was considered important as showing knowledge on the part of deceased that there had been trouble between defendant and the marine Brinton prior to the time of the meeting on the street when the shooting occurred. The district attorney announced that he was surprised by the statement of the witness, and proceeded, with the permission of the court, to ask leading questions to show that this witness in the office of the district attorney, when he related the statement made by the deceased, had failed to mention that the latter had said that appellant had had trouble with his (deceased's) friend. The matter of permitting this cross-examination of the state's witness by the district attorney was one within the discretion of the court, and it does not appear that this discretion was abused. There was sufficient to show that the witness was inclined to be favorable to the defense, and also to show that the district attorney was surprised by the statement made which has been quoted. Counsel cites several authorities in support of his proposition that reversible error was committed in this regard, but, when we apply those decisions to the facts exhibited by this record, they do not sustain the contention made. In one of the cases, People v. Creeks, 141 Cal. 529, 75 Pac. 101, it is said:

"Where a witness called by a party has simply failed to testify to all that party expected or desired, but has not given testimony against him, it is not permissible for the party calling him to prove that such witness had previously made statements which, if sworn to at the trial, would tend to make out his case."

Here Langford did testify to matter which was "against" the prosecution. Clearly in that case it was proper for the district attorney to show that he had made contrary statements or had failed to include in an apparently full statement theretofore made the important sentence which had been added in his testimony.

[6] The objection that the district attorney asked improper questions of the defendant on cross-examination and was so guilty of misconduct in our view has no merit. The matter pointed out referred to the cross-examination wherein the district attorney inquired of the defendant as to what name he had been married under. On direct examination defendant's counsel had brought out the fact that the defendant was married, and the district attorney followed this up by inquiring as to when and where and under what name defendant had been married. Defendant's counsel, while the district attorney was cross-examining, tendered the certificate of marriage, which was not accepted by the prosecutor. Presumably the certificate of marriage showed the name the defendant had used at the time that ceremony was performed, and, if it did so show it, then certainly there could have been no error in requiring the defendant himself to state the fact upon the witness stand. His counsel made an express tender of the marriage certificate, and, even though his objection to the question asked calling for the name used was well taken, his offer to show that name by the certificate amounted to a waiver of the objection.

The strictures passed by the district attorney in his argument upon the attitude and conduct of the police department respecting the prosecution of appellant were severe, and, as the trial judge remarked, might well have been omitted. However, we have examined carefully the assignments of error predicated upon the ground of that official's misconduct and do not feel that a reversal is warranted on account thereof. There were suggestions made throughout the trial, having some import in that direction, which indicated that the police department felt an interest in the defense of appellant as a fellow police officer, and it was for the jury to determine whether the district attorney's conclusions were justified upon the whole evidence.

[7] The court by its instructions seems to have covered the case fully and carefully, and to have stated all of the propositions of law applicable to the charge and the evidence. It was proper for the jury to be instructed that a police officer had no greater nor less right than a private citizen to use a deadly weapon under the circumstances disclosed by the evidence. On behalf of the defendant it was proper for the jury to be advised that a police officer had as much right to defend himself as a private citizen, and on behalf of the prosecution it was proper that the jury should be advised that because defendant was a police officer he would not be justified in acting upon lesser provocation in using his weapon to kill than would a private individual.

[8] We can see no force in the criticism of the instruction which detailed the right of a person threatened with great bodily harm at the hands of another to use a deadly weapon in repelling his assailant. That defendant had the right to act upon appearances and shoot his assailant if, as a reasonable man, under all of the circumstances, he was justified in believing that an assault was about to be committed which would inflict upon him great bodily harm, was fully expressed in the instructions. The jury resolved the facts against the appellant under the evidence, and we agree with the trial judge in the statement made at the time the motion for a new trial was denied, when he said that there was plenty of room under the evidence for the jury to reach the conclusion that appellant was not justified, as a reasonable man, in believing, at the time he fired the shot which killed Collier, that he was about to suffer great bodily injury at the hands of the four marines.

From a careful examination of the whole record it appears that appellant has had a fair trial. The verdict and judgment should not, therefore, be disturbed.

PEOPLE v. KEKO et al. (Cr. 387.)

1. BURGLARY $\hookrightarrow$ 42—EVIDENCE—POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY.

In a prosecution under an information charging burglary in entering a room with intent to commit larceny, defendant's unexplained possession of stolen property was not of itself sufficient to justify a conviction, though admissible as a circumstance on the issue of guilt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 80, 104-107; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 42.]

2. BURGLARY $\hookrightarrow$ 3—ELEMENTS—INTENT.

In a prosecution for burglary in the first degree under an information charging burglary in entering a certain room with intent to commit larceny, the intent was a primary and essential element of the charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 24-27; Dec. Dig. $\hookrightarrow$ 3.]

3. CRIMINAL LAW $\hookrightarrow$ 1186—MISCONDUCT OF PROSECUTING ATTORNEY—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, provides that a new trial shall not be granted unless the court shall be of opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Pen. Code, § 1323, provides that accused cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself, and that his refusal to testify shall not prejudice him nor be used against him at the trial. In a prosecution for burglary, the district attorney in argument suggested that defendants had failed to explain their possession of the stolen goods, and, after the court had stated that defendants did not have to testify, again referred to the fact that it was in their power to explain such possession. Held, that the district attorney's conduct deprived defendants of a substantial right, and was reversible error.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. A. Sloane, Judge.

Angelo Keko and Roberto Rables were convicted of burglary in the first degree, and from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial, they appeal. Judgment and order reversed.

E. L. Johnson and A. L. Dorn, both of San Diego, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Dept. Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The defendants have been convicted of the crime of burglary in the first degree pursuant to an information charging them with that crime in having entered a certain room with intent to commit larceny. They appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

[1] It is contended on behalf of the appellants that there is no evidence which tended to connect them with the commission of the offense charged, except the mere fact that each of them was found in possession of a part of the articles which, according to the testimony, had been stolen from the room occupied by one R. F. Holmes, owner of the stolen property. While the mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendant, is not of itself and standing alone sufficient to justify a conviction of burglary, even if it be shown to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt that by some one the alleged burglary was committed, yet such possession of stolen property is a circumstance which, taken in connection with other incriminating evidence in the case, may be considered by the jury in determining the question of the guilt or innocence of a defendant so charged. People v. King, 8 Cal. App. 329, 96 Pac. 916. Without further reviewing the facts, it is sufficient to say that each of these defendants was found in possession of part of the stolen property under circumstances which might have justified the jury in concluding that they were the guilty parties.

[2] The court instructed the jury that:

"The question of intent is not involved in this case, for the reason that if there is any evidence against these defendants sufficient to convict at all, it establishes the fact of a larceny having been committed in connection with the burglary. The evidence if it discloses anything, discloses that larceny was committed by whoever entered the room of this complaining witness, so that no question of intent to commit larceny is involved in this case, or at least the intent is not necessary to be shown other than by the evidence that the larceny was in fact committed, so that the question for you to determine, after determining by the evidence whether or not the room of this complaining witness was entered and his goods stolen therefrom, is to determine whether or not these defendants or either of them committed the larceny and burglary."

The foregoing instruction is erroneous in its declaration that the question of intent is not involved in the case. It was one of the most primary and essential elements in the charge against the defendants.

[3] It is urged on behalf of appellants that on account of misconduct of the district attorney they are entitled to a reversal of the judgment against them. In our opinion, this contention should be sustained. The defendants did not testify in their own behalf. Section 1323 of the Penal Code provides that:

"A defendant in a criminal action or proceeding cannot be compelled to be a witness against himself. * * * His neglect or refusal to be a witness cannot, in any manner, prejudice him nor be used against him on the trial or proceeding."

The district attorney in his argument to the jury suggested that the defendants had failed to explain why they had the stolen goods in their possession. Counsel for defendants objected to this remark, and the court responded:

"They don't have to testify in the case. I think what counsel refers to is perhaps the rule of law in reference to what force there is in the possession of stolen property unexplained. The jury will be instructed that the defendants are not required to go on the stand themselves."

A moment later the district attorney again referred to the fact that it had been in the power of the defendants to explain how they got the goods, and further said:

"They had the opportunity; all they had to do was to take the stand and tell you; that has not been done. They have in that way refused to explain to you circumstances which would justify you in finding them not guilty. * * *

Referring to similar flagrant misconduct of the district attorney, the court of appeal in the third district held that:

"In the face of so plain a provision of law, we cannot say that it may be openly violated without prejudice to the defendant." People v. Morris, 3 Cal. App. 6, 84 Pac. 465.

Since the time of that decision the people have adopted section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution, designed to prevent the reversal of judgments or the granting of new trials on account of errors in matters of procedure—"unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice."

In the case at bar the evidence connecting defendants with the crime is merely circumstantial. While, as above stated, we think it was sufficient to support the verdict, we do not believe that it was so far conclusive that the judgment should be sustained in the face of misconduct in the trial which deprived the defendants of a substantial right guaranteed to them by law.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. LIERA. (Cr. 382.)

1. HOMICIDE — 236 — INFLECTION OF FATAL WOUNDS — EVIDENCE.

A third person struck decedent on the left side of the head with a beer bottle, causing decedent to fall to the ground. Immediately thereafter accused shot decedent five times, inflicting wounds sufficient to cause death. The coroner's physician who examined decedent's body stated that the immediate cause of death was probably a fracture of the skull, and that either one of the injuries would cause death. All of the physicians agreed that the blow might have caused instantaneous death, but none of them insisted that it necessarily did so. Held to authorize the jury to find that decedent was alive when accused fired the shots, and that the effect of the shots was to hasten death, thereby authorizing a conviction.

2. HOMICIDE — 305 — EVIDENCE — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the evidence showed that accused was present when a third person struck decedent a fatal blow, and that accused instantly shot decedent, inflicting fatal wounds, and the prosecution showed the entire transaction, including the acts of the third person, instructions authorizing a conviction of accused as an accomplice of the third person or as an accessory were proper, though the information charged accused, in the ordinary form, with murder, without reference to the act of the third person or the means by which death was produced; since, under Pen. Code, § 31, declaring that all persons concerned in a crime are principals, and section 971, abrogating the distinction between accessory before the fact and a principal, and between principals in the first and second degrees in felony cases, the mere fact that the information charged accused solely as a principal did not prevent his conviction as principal, though he acted as an accomplice or accessory.

4. CRIMINAL LAW — 789 — INSTRUCTIONS — REASONABLE DOUBT.

Where on a trial for murder the only doubt that could have been produced by the evidence as to the cause of decedent's death would be a doubt as to the results of a blow inflicted by a third person and of shots fired by accused, an instruction that, if there was any reasonable doubt as to what caused decedent's death, accused was entitled to an acquittal, was properly refused, for such doubt might have existed without entitling accused to an acquittal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Claudio Liera was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Walton J. Wood, Public Defender, and David R. Faries, Deputy Public Defender, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert M. Clarke, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CONREY, P. J. The appellant, Liera, having been convicted of the crime of murder in the second degree, was sentenced to state prison for a term of years. His appeal is from the judgment.

At about 11 o'clock on the night of June 7, 1914, the deceased, Teofilo Gonzales, was asleep in the house of Alberto Hernandez, in the county of Los Angeles. Several members of the Hernandez family were in the house and all had retired for the night. At this time the defendant, together with Juan Lopez and Tomas Estrada, came to the house and knocked at the door. These men were followed in a few minutes by Mrs. Hermana, who lived with Lopez. Shortly afterward, some controversy having arisen, these visitors and some of the Hernandez household were talking together near the house. Thereupon Teofilo Gonzales, roused from sleep by the disturbance, came out, and as he came out he asked, "What is the difficulty?" Juan Lopez replied, "Whatever you want," and at the same time struck Gonzales on the left side of the head in the temporal region with a beer bottle. Gonzales fell backward to the ground, and immediately thereafter the defendant, Liera, fired five times with a pistol, putting five bullets into the body of Gonzales.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the evidence shows that Gonzales was killed instantly by the blow received from Lopez, and was dead when the shots were fired by defendant. This contention is not conclusively established by the evidence, and the exact moment of the death of Gonzales is not shown. The testimony of the coroner's physician who examined the body was that the immediate cause of death, in his opinion, was probably a fracture of the skull, and that either one of the injuries would have caused death. All of the physicians agreed that the blow might have caused instantaneous death, but none of them insisted that it necessarily produced that effect. All agreed that the gunshot wounds were sufficient to have caused death. Under these circumstances the jury might have found that Gonzales was alive when the shots were fired by defendant, and that the effect of those shots was to hasten the death. If this were so, the appellant's own acts in firing the shots would be held to have been sufficient to justify his conviction.

[2] The court by its instructions assumed that the evidence might tend to show, and that the jury might find, that although the immediate cause of death was the blow administered to deceased by Juan Lopez, yet that the defendant might be convicted as an accomplice of Lopez in that assault, if the jury should find that his actions were those of an accomplice. It does not appear that the defendant had any quarrel with the deceased either before or at the time of the above-mentioned transactions, or that any ill will existed between them. If there is any ground for the finding that the defendant was accessory to the act of Lopez in making the attack upon the deceased, such ground exists solely in the circumstance that the defendant was present when the blow was struck by Lopez, and that he instantly thereafter followed that blow by firing those shots which made the death an assured fact, if it was not already inevitable. The court instructed the jury:

"That in order to render a person an accomplice he or she must in some manner knowingly and with criminal intent aid, abet, assist, or participate in the criminal act."

Also:

"That an accomplice is one who, knowing that a crime is being committed, willfully and with criminal intent intentionally aids, abets, and assists another in the commission of such crime or criminal act, and whether or not one is an accomplice as defined in these instructions, is for the jury to determine from all the testimony and circumstances in proof in the case."

Also that:

"For one person to abet another in the commission of a criminal offense simply means to knowingly and with criminal intent aid, promote, encourage, or instigate, by act or counsel, or by both act and counsel, the commission of such criminal offense."

The court further instructed the jury:

"You are instructed that the distinction between an accessory before the fact and a principal in case of a felony is abrogated in this state, and all persons concerned in the commission of a felony, whether they directly commit the act, constituting the offense or aid and abet in its commission, though not present, shall be prosecuted, tried, and punished as principals. You are further instructed that, if you believe from the whole evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that this defendant, together with Juan Lopez, at the time and place alleged in the information, made an assault on the person of the deceased, and in the furtherance of a common purpose to assault said deceased inflicted injuries which caused his death, then you are instructed that it is immaterial, if you find that there was more than one injury inflicted of a character to produce death, which of said injuries it was, in fact, that produced the death of the deceased. It is sufficient that any one or more of said injuries was of a character to, and did in fact, produce the death of the deceased."

The information was in the ordinary form, charging appellant with the crime of murder, and it made no reference to the act of Juan Lopez or the means by which death was produced. Appellant's counsel contend that these instructions assume a complicity by defendant which could not exist under the information, and which was utterly unproven by the evidence. In order to sustain these objections it would be necessary for us to hold that where two men have made an unprovoked attack upon a third person, and each one has administered a blow capable of causing the death, but the death actually occurred from the first blow, that the one who administered the second blow could not be convicted of the murder without direct testimony showing that he had advised, aided, or abetted in the striking of the first blow. To adopt this theory would take away from the jury the right to find as a fact from the circumstances that the attack was a joint enterprise from beginning to end. We are not able to agree with this contention. We do agree that the court is not entitled to give instructions assuming the finding of facts of which there is no evidence; but we think that the case presented here is not an illustration of that rule.

It is further claimed that these instructions relating to the accomplice theory are objectionable for the reason that the prosecution tried its case upon the theory that defendant acted solely as a principal and upon the theory that his act was the sole and efficient cause of the death, and that the judge by these instructions injected into the case a theory foreign to that upon which the evidence had been presented. We think that this objection is not sustained by the record. The evidence produced on behalf of the prosecution included a full account of the transaction, including the acts of Juan Lopez. The mere fact that the information charged the defendant solely as a principal is not sufficient to prevent his conviction as such principal, even though he acted as an accomplice, or as accessory to another in the commission of the unlawful acts. Pen. Code, §§ 31, 971.

[3] Complaint is made that the court refused to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. The propositions involved in these instructions were: (1) That, if the jury believed from the evidence that Gonzales died as a result of a blow on the head inflicted by Juan Lopez with a beer bottle, it was their duty to acquit the defendant; (2) that, if they believed from the evidence that Gonzales was dying as a result of the fracture of his skull inflicted by a blow on his head by Juan Lopez when the shots fired by the defendant struck him, and that the death of the deceased was not hastened as a result of the pistol shot wounds, it was their duty to acquit the defendant. The court was justified in refusing these instructions, for the reason that they ignored and excluded from consideration any evidence tending to show and from which the jury may have believed that under the circumstances shown the defendant was accessory to the acts of Lopez in the attack made upon the deceased.

[4] Counsel for appellant complain that the court did not give three other instructions, and specify that one of these instructions "was not given elsewhere in so far as applicable." This last-mentioned instruction was that:

If there is in your minds any reasonable doubt as to what caused the death of the deceased, it is your duty to give the defendant the benefit of such doubt and to acquit him."

The only doubt that could have been produced by the evidence with respect to the cause of the death of Gonzales would be a doubt as to the relative results of the blow administered by Lopez and of the shots fired by the defendant. Manifestly, such doubt might have existed without entitling the defendant to a verdict of acquittal.

The judgment is affirmed.

ANDERSON v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA et al.
(Civ. 1535.)

1. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS — 11 — EMPLOYMENT BY DENTAL PRACTITIONER OF UNLICENSED PERSON — KNOWLEDGE — STATUTE.

Where a dental practitioner was charged with a violation of St. 1901, p. 564, as amended, regulating the practice of dentistry, by having knowingly employed an unlicensed person in his office to perform operations on human teeth, and for having knowingly permitted such person to use his offices and the paraphernalia therein, and was suspended therefor by the board of dental examiners, it was no defense to such practitioner that he did not know that his employé was not possessed of a license to practice dentistry, since the duty was on him to ascertain that fact before taking such employé into his service.

2. EVIDENCE — 1 — JUDICIAL NOTICE — TRIBUNALS.

The exercise of judicial notice is not confined to courts of record, since the doctrine is based on convenience and expediency.

3. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS — 11 — JUDICIAL NOTICE — EXERCISE BY BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS — STATUTE.

The board of dental examiners, created by St. 1901, c. 175, as amended, regulating the practice of dentistry, in determining whether a practitioner was subject to suspension for having violated the act by employing in his office as a dental surgeon a person unlicensed by such board, could take judicial notice of its own records to determine whether such employé of the practitioner had been duly licensed.

Application for writ of review by R. C. Anderson against the Board of Dental Examiners of California, and others. Denied.

Herbert Choynski and John T. Williams, both of San Francisco, for petitioner. Oliver Dibble, of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a hearing upon an application for a writ of review directed to the board of dental examiners of the state of California, requiring said board to certify to this court its proceedings in the matter of the suspension of the license of the petitioner herein to practice the profession of dentistry for the period of one year. The entire record of the board in such matter is before the court in response to said writ; and from such record it appears that on the 16th day of April, 1914, one Carl Schroeder filed with the board of dental examiners a verified accusation, wherein it was set forth in substance that the petitioner herein, himself a regularly licensed and practicing dentist, maintaining offices at a fixed place of business in the city of San Francisco, had been guilty of unprofessional conduct, consisting in the violation of the provisions of the "act to insure the better education of practitioners in dental surgery and to regulate the practice of dentistry in the state of California," approved March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 564), and variously amended up to 1913; which alleged violation of said act consisted in the alleged fact that the petitioner herein had knowingly employed one James V. Munn in his dental offices for the purpose of performing operations on and treating lesions of the human teeth and jaws, and had knowingly permitted said Munn the use of his said offices and of the paraphernalia therein for the purpose of practicing dentistry as the same is defined in said act, and that at the time of his said employment and permission the said Munn was not licensed to practice dentistry in the state of California, which fact was during said time known to the petitioner herein.

Upon the filing of said accusation the board issued a citation to said petitioner, directing him to appear at a stated time and place and answer the same; and, the petitioner having appeared and presented a demurrer to the sufficiency of said accusation, and also a denial of its material averments, a hearing thereon was had, at which testimony pro and con was taken, at the conclusion of which the said board made its findings that the averments of the accusation had been sustained, and entered its decision and order thereon that the license of the petitioner be suspended for the period of one year.

Upon the hearing before this court it was conceded on the part of the petitioner that the board of dental examiners had jurisdiction to entertain and try an accusation of the kind presented under the terms of the aforesaid act creating and defining the powers of said board. It was, however, contended by the petitioner, and conceded by the respondent, that if, upon the hearing of such accusation before said board, the evidence entirely failed to sustain any material averment thereof, the board would not have jurisdiction to make the order in question, and that its attempted action in that regard would be beyond its jurisdiction, and hence subject to review in this form of proceeding; the petitioner having no right of appeal nor any other plain, speedy, nor adequate remedy from the effect of such order.

It was the contention of the petitioner at the hearing upon this writ that the proofs offered in support of the accusation before the board of dental examiners had utterly failed in the following material respects: First, that there was no evidence adduced showing, or in any way tending to show, that the petitioner herein was ever, prior to said accusation, informed, or that he ever knew, that said Munn was not duly licensed to practice dentistry; and, second, that the proofs adduced at said hearing further failed utterly to show, that said Munn was not at all times during the period of his employment by the petitioner as a dental operator, and of his permission to practice dentistry in the petitioner's offices, and to make use of his paraphernalia therein for that purpose, a duly licensed dental practitioner under the laws of this state.

[1] As to the first of these propositions, the respondent contends, and we think correctly, that if it be the fact that the said Munn was not the possessor of such license to practice the profession of dentistry as would make him an available subject of employment by the petitioner for the purposes for which the evidence shows he was utilized in the latter's offices, or to have permission to use said offices and the paraphernalia therof for the practice of dentistry, which the evidence sufficiently shows he did, the duty was cast upon the petitioner to ascertain that fact before taking Munn into his service for such purposes, or permitting him to make use of his offices and appliances for the practice of dentistry, and hence his knowledge of the fact, if it be a fact, is to be assumed.

The question involved in the second contention is as to the power of the board to take judicial notice of its records for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not a dental license was ever issued to the person alleged to have been wrongfully employed.

Section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure attempts to enumerate the subjects of which judicial cognizance will be taken. The interpretations that the courts of different jurisdictions have placed upon these and similar provisions are not uniform, so it is impossible to state a general rule upon the subject. It has been held that courts will take judicial notice of their records and officers. Hollenbach v. Schnabel, 101 Cal. 312, 35 Pac. 872, 40 Am. St. Rep. 57; Pitkin v. Cowen (C. C.) 91 Fed. 599; Dyer v. Last, 51 Ill. 179; 7 Ency. of Evidence, 1009; Ferris v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 158 Ill. 237, 41 N. E. 1118; 16 Cyc. 915.

[2] Judicial notice is based upon convenience and expediency, and its application is not confined to courts of record. Thus it has been held with respect to proceedings in a municipal court, instituted for the express purpose of enforcing municipal ordinances, and vested with full jurisdiction for that purpose, that the ordinances are the peculiar law of the forum, and the court is bound to take judicial notice of their existence. Ex parte Davis, 115 Cal. 445, 47 Pac. 258.

[3] There are in addition to courts certain boards and special tribunals for determining certain classes of rights; and while they are not strictly courts, they partake of their nature, and their findings partake of the nature of judgments. The jurisdiction of such bodies rests upon the same basis as inferior courts, and they, too, may take judicial notice of certain matters. Thus in People v. Board of Excise, 17 Misc. Rep. 98, 40 N. Y. Supp. 741, the board was given power to revoke licenses where the licensed premises were kept as a disorderly house; and it was held that, although no proof was offered before the board upon the inquiry that the premises (where the alleged unlawful acts were committed) were ever licensed, such lack of proof did not affect the judgment of the board, as it could take judicial notice of the premises that it had licensed. Statutes or ordinances creating tribunals of the character of the board of medical examiners seldom prescribe the practice to govern such bodies in determining cases instituted before them. No such guide is provided under the medical act for the revocation of licenses; and while the exercise of these powers is a quasi judicial function, still such exercise should not be governed by the strict legal rules applicable to courts. Learning in the law is not one of the qualifications required of the members composing the board; and to hold under these circumstances that the board's investigations should be conducted according to technical legal rules would have the effect of seriously impairing the successful performance of the duties for which that body was created. Munk v. Frink, 81 Neb. 631, 116 N. W. 525, 17 L. R. A. (N. S.) 439. It would have been an easy matter for petitioner to produce proof of the fact that Munn had been licensed, if such were the fact, for by the statute the board is charged with the duty of keeping a roll of licensed practitioners; and under these circumstances it would be idle to say that it could not judicially notice who were and who were not duly licensed.

For the reasons stated the petitioner's application is denied.

4. WITNESSES — 406 — IMPEACHMENT — HEARSAY — ADMISSIBILITY.

In a suit to set aside a conveyance of mortgages and notes as fraudulent to creditors, plaintiff sought to show that statements in a letter written by defendant to his agent disclosed a fraudulent intent. The letter was lost, and the agent could not recollect its contents. Held, that defendant, having testified to the bona fides of the transaction, could not be impeached by evidence of declarations made by the agent to a third person as to the contents of the letter, such evidence being the merest hearsay.

5. PLEADING — 237 — AMENDMENT — RIGHT TO AMEND.

In a judgment creditor's suit to set aside an assignment of mortgages and notes, the complaint averred that the mortgages and notes were deposited under an agreement for delivery to the debtor if he held the payees harmless on a bail bond, and that the debtor thereafter assigned them to one M. Held that, as the theory of the complaint was that the ultimate assignment to M. was fraudulent, and plaintiff having been allowed all latitude in proving fraud therein, a refusal of the court to permit an amendment to change the complaint so as to conform it to the proof that the deposit as security and the assignment conditionally to M. was a single transaction was not error, plaintiff having enjoyed all the rights the amendment would have given him.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR — 612 — MATTERS REVIEWABLE — MOTION.

Before the court rendered its decision plaintiff's counsel moved to reopen the case. Plaintiff's exceptions to the denial of his motion were preserved in a bill of exceptions appearing as part of the proceedings of the trial. Held, that the matter was sufficiently authenticated to be reviewed on appeal, the order overruling the motion not being itself appealable, and court rule 39, requiring authentication of certain motions, applying only to those orders in which an appeal might be taken.

7. TRIAL — 68 — REOPENING OF CASE — DISCRETION.

The reopening of a case after the close of the evidence is in the discretion of the trial court.

8. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — 310 — ACTION TO SET ASIDE — FINDINGS — SUFFICIENCY OF FINDING.

In a suit to set aside a conveyance as a fraud on creditors, a finding which did not determine the interest of persons whose rights were admitted in the pleadings is not defective.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 959-961; Dec. Dig. — 310.]

9. ESCROWS — 1 — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

An owner of property sold it, receiving notes secured by mortgages in payment. The notes and mortgages were made payable to the sureties on his bail bond. The sureties thereafter deposited the notes and mortgages with a bank under an agreement that they should be delivered to the owner in case the sureties were discharged from liability on the bail bond. Held, that no conditional title was vested in the sureties, and they merely held a lien in the nature of a mortgage, so the transaction did not constitute an escrow under Civ. Code, § 1057, declaring that a grant may be deposited by the grantor with a third person, to be delivered on performance of a condition, and while in the possession of the depository it is called an "escrow."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Escrow.]

10. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — 310 — ACTION TO SET ASIDE — FINDINGS — SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit to set aside a conveyance of notes secured by mortgages, the court found that at the time of seizure and sale of the notes under plaintiff's execution they belonged to one M., but made no finding as to the right of the ostensible payees, who, it was admitted in the pleadings, held them merely as security. The conclusions of law were that plaintiff never had any interest in the notes, except such as he might have acquired by purchase at execution sale, and that the levy of execution on the securities was wrongful. Held, that there was no conflict between the finding and the conclusions of law.

11. APPEAL AND ERROR ☞1071 — REVIEW — REASONS FOR DECISION.

Where the findings of fact supported a judgment, it will not be disturbed because of conflicts between conclusions of law.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; Geo. E. Church, Judge.

Action by C. A. Phenegar against P. R. Paolini and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. Cosgrave, of Fresno, for appellant. W. D. Crichton and C. K. Bonestell, both of Fresno, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiff, as a judgment creditor of the defendant E. Desperati originally proceeded in this action by way of a creditor's bill for the purpose of obtaining a decree declaring void and setting aside a transfer by the latter to the defendant Marchetti of certain notes and mortgages upon the ground that said transfer had been made with the intent to defraud the plaintiff of his claim against the said defendant Desperati.

The third amended and supplemental complaint, upon which, with the answers thereto and a cross-complaint by the defendant Marchetti, the present action was tried, was filed after the plaintiff had obtained a judgment against Desperati upon the claim held by the former against the latter and after execution had thereupon been issued and levied upon the notes and mortgages in question, the latter sold by the sheriff under said execution, and the proceeds of said sale applied toward the satisfaction of the plaintiff's judgment. The object of the present action is, in effect, to secure a judgment quieting plaintiff's title to the notes and mortgages in dispute.

It appears, from the complaint that Desperati, in September, 1908, "and at all times thereafter," was indebted to the plaintiff in the sum of $1,826.28, and that the plaintiff, on March 14, 1911, brought an action against Desperati to recover said sum, in the superior court of Fresno county, recovering judgment in the sum so sued for on the 24th day of August, 1911.

Departing now from the order in which the facts are stated in the complaint, these may here be stated:

The defendant Desperati, prior to the time at which the notes and mortgages in dispute were transferred, had been convicted of the crime of grand larceny in the superior court of Fresno county, and judgment of sentence thereupon pronounced against him. He, however, took and prosecuted an appeal to the court of appeal from the judgment of conviction, and was by the trial court admitted to bail, pending the determination of said appeal. He subsequently gave said bail, the defendants P. R. Paolini and A. G. Leverone becoming sureties thereon. At and prior to this time Desperati was the owner of two certain tracts of land which are situated in Fresno county and specifically described in the complaint. The title to both these tracts of land, on the 30th day of March, 1910, stood in the names of and was held by the defendants Paolini and Leverone, but, so the complaint alleges, "neither of said defendants at any time had any interest therein save as trustees only for the benefit of said E. Desperati." On September 19, 1910, Desperati, acting through his said trustees as aforesaid, sold one of said tracts of land to one Adolfo Pierini and the other to one Guido Dami, and executed deeds to the said grantees, respectively, to said tracts of land. As a part of the purchase price of the land so purchased by Pierini, the latter executed and delivered to Paolini and Leverone his three several promissory notes, each being dated September 19, 1910, and payable as follows: The first, for $1,176.66, on the 1st day of October, 1914; the second, for $1,176.66, on October 1, 1915; and the third for $1,476.66, on October 1, 1916—each of said notes providing for interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum, and all secured by a mortgage upon the land sold to Pierini. Dami, who purchased the tract of land secondly described in the complaint, as a part of the purchase price thereof, on the date of the transfer, likewise executed and delivered to Paolini and Leverone his three several promissory notes for $575 each, due and payable October 1, 1914, October 1, 1915, and October 1, 1916, respectively, each bearing interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum and secured by a mortgage upon the land so sold to him. Both said mortgages were duly recorded in the office of the county recorder of Fresno county.

It is alleged in the complaint that, the said Paolini and Leverone having become sureties on the bail bond of Desperati, as above explained, Desperati authorized and caused each of said notes and mortgages to be made and the same were made and taken in the names of said bondsmen (Paolini and Leverone) as payees and mortgages thereof, "instead of in the name of E. Desperati, the real owner thereof"; that the defendants Paolini and Leverone "at all times held the same in trust for said Desperati to indemnify themselves against any liability upon said bail bond as hereinbefore alleged, and not otherwise."

On October 3, 1910, so the complaint declares, Paolini and Leverone, acting under instructions and by the direction of Desperati, "and not otherwise," indorsed all the notes above mentioned in blank and prepared and executed an assignment of the mortgages given to secure said notes to the defendant Frank Marchetti, and thereupon deposited in the Bank of Central California, as depository, the said assignment, together with the notes and mortgages, with instructions to said bank to deliver the same to said Marchetti whenever and in the event that the judgment of conviction of grand larceny against Desperati was reversed by the District Court of Appeal, to which an appeal from said judgment had been taken, and the sureties on the latter's bail bond, Paolini and Leverone, were thereupon released and discharged from the obligations of said undertaking. Prior, however, to the decision by the appellate court in the criminal case against Desperati, and before the sureties were released from the obligations of said bail bond, and consequently before the delivery of the notes and mortgages under the assignment to Marchetti, said notes and mortgages were, as before stated, seized by the sheriff under the writ of execution issued upon the judgment obtained by the plaintiff in the action above referred to, and, after due proceedings, sold by that officer to the plaintiff, who paid therefore the sum of $1,505, which sum was by the sheriff credited on said judgment.

The complaint charges that the purported assignment of the notes and mortgages to Marchetti was executed without any consideration, and that it was made by Paolini and Leverone, under the express direction of Desperati, with the fraudulent intent on the part of all the defendants and for the sole purpose of placing said notes and mortgages beyond the reach of the claim of the plaintiff against Desperati, and to prevent the plaintiff from securing satisfaction of said claim.

The complaint further alleges that, notwithstanding the ownership of said notes and mortgages by the plaintiff, the defendants still claim ownership thereof on behalf of said Marchetti, and "obstruct and annoy the plaintiff in the possession and enjoyment thereof, and do now prevent plaintiff from collecting the interest due upon said notes and mortgages, and said defendants, in pursuance of the design of all of said defendants to place said notes and mortgages beyond the reach of this plaintiff, claim ownership thereof in said Frank Marchetti by reason of said fraudulent assignment, and do thereby jeopardize the title of this plaintiff in and to the same." The prayer asks that the plaintiff be declared the owner of the notes and mortgages, and that the purported assignment of the same to Marchetti be ordered delivered up and canceled.

Marchetti filed an answer and a cross-complaint. In the former he specifically denies each and all the allegations of the complaint involving the charge of fraud in the transaction whereby the notes and mortgages concerned here were transferred to him, and admits that he claims ownership of the said notes and mortgages.

His cross-complaint contains, substantially, the same allegations as are contained in the plaintiff's complaint respecting the circumstances under which the tracts of land and the notes and mortgages described in said complaint were transferred to Paolini and Leverone. He then alleges that said notes and mortgages were transferred to him by Paolini and Leverone, by the direction of Desperati, in consideration of an indebtedness of $5,000, or thereabouts, due from Desperati to him, and which indebtedness had existed before and at the time of the execution of said transfer; that the assignment to him was, as stated in the plaintiff's complaint, deposited in the bank therein named, and was to take effect whenever and in the event of a decision on appeal favorable to Desperati in the criminal case pending against him; "that said assignment was not made for the purpose of defrauding any creditor of the defendant Desperati, but for the purpose of preferring this cross-complainant as a bona fide creditor of said Desperati's," etc. He asked for a decree adjudging him to be the owner of the notes and mortgages in question and compelling the plaintiff to deliver the same to him.

The defendants Paolini and Leverone, jointly answering the complaint, denied the allegations of fraud in the transfer of the notes and mortgages to Marchetti, and admitted the claim of ownership thereof by the latter, and allege that he is the owner thereof.

The plaintiff by specific denials answered the cross-complaint.

Upon the issues thus framed the cause was tried by the court without a jury, and the court found the facts substantially as they are stated in the cross-complaint of Marchetti, and further found:

"That, at the time of said transfer by the said Desperati to the said Marchetti, the former had property in this state other than hereinabove referred to, which plaintiff could have compelled defendant Desperati to apply to the satisfaction of said Desperati's indebtedness to him."

Upon said findings and the conclusions of law following therefrom judgment was entered in favor of the defendant and cross-complainant Marchetti adjudging him to be the owner of said notes and mortgages, and requiring the plaintiff to deliver the same to the possession of Marchetti and to account to the latter for any amounts which the plaintiff may have collected upon said notes and pay the same over to said cross-complainant.

This appeal is prosecuted, upon a bill of exceptions by the plaintiff from the said judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. The motion for a new trial was based upon the asserted insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, of errors in law occurring at the trial, and upon the alleged error of the trial court in denying the plaintiff's motion to reopen the case after the same had been submitted and prior to the decision, "for the admission of evidence in rebuttal and in furtherance of justice." And these are the general points upon which the claim for a reversal is here advanced.

There is no dispute as to the indebtedness of Desperati to the plaintiff in the sum for which the latter obtained judgment against the former; nor is it disputed that the plaintiff bought the notes and mortgages at the sheriff's sale under the execution issued upon the said judgment. And the evidence shows, as the pleadings admit, these facts: That Desperati was, on the 15th day of March, 1910, convicted of the crime of grand larceny; that he appealed from the judgment of conviction to the Court of Appeal, and that the trial judge admitted him to bail pending the determination of his case on appeal, and that he gave a bail bond, Paolini and Leverone qualifying as sureties thereon; that Paolini and Leverone, as a condition to becoming such sureties, exacted from Desperati indemnity against loss in the event that he (Desperati) failed to obey the requirements of said bond; that Desperati thereupon, and for the purpose of indemnifying his bondsmen, executed a deed of trust to the two tracts of land described in the complaint to Paolini and Leverone; that thereafter Desperati left the state of California and went to Canada, and remained there for some time; that the trustees, by the direction of Desperati, subsequently sold the two tracts of land, taking as part payment therefor the notes and mortgages in dispute, and holding the same for the purpose for which the property had previously been conveyed to them in trust, as above explained; that the transfer of said notes and mortgages was, under instructions from Desperati, made to Marchetti by Paolini and Leverone on the 3d day of October, 1910, the same to be delivered to the transferee by the Bank of Central California, with which they were deposited, "whenever and in the event that the judgment of conviction theretofore had and taken in the said action * * * wherein said Desperati was convicted of grand larceny, was reversed by the District Court of Appeal."

[1] The specific contention of the plaintiff is, however, that the evidence does not support the finding that the transfer of the notes and mortgages by Desperati to Marchetti involved a bona fide transaction or one founded upon a valuable consideration. This constitutes the subject and the crux of the controversy so far as the evidence is concerned.

It must be conceded that the testimony of both Desperati and Marchetti appears to be full of self-contradictions upon certain of the material circumstances of the alleged indebtedness of Desperati to Marchetti in the sum of $5,200, to extinguish which was the object of the transfer of the notes and mortgages to Marchetti; yet we cannot say that the trial court's conclusion as to that matter was not justified or is not supported, since it appears that both Desperati and Marchetti positively testified that they had been partners in the business of farming for a considerable portion of the period of ten years; that during a part of that period Marchetti was employed by Desperati, and that at no time in that period was there ever a settlement between them, and that they never had had a settlement until a short time prior to the transfer of the notes and mortgages to Marchetti, when it was ascertained that Desperati was indebted to Marchetti in the sum for which said transfer was executed; that the settlement between Desperati and Marchetti and the transfer of the notes and mortgages to the latter transpired before the sheriff seized and sold the notes, etc., under the execution issuing on the plaintiff's judgment.

It is not our intention, nor is it necessary to point out herein the apparent inconsistencies in the testimony of Desperati and Marchetti and some of the other witnesses who were introduced in support of the claims of the defendants. It is deemed enough to say that, while it was important to emphasize the alleged contradictions before the trial court, we cannot perceive that an examination or consideration of them by this court can lead to a result different from that arrived at by the trial judge, since there is nothing in the inconsistencies themselves which justify us in holding that they stamp the entire testimony of the witnesses as so intrinsically unbelievable as to render it insufficient to support the decision. While a reviewing court cannot always say that the evidence justified the decision, it can in the general run of cases, with no difficulty, or without hesitation, hold that the evidence, as it appears to it, supports the decision. This results from the fact that in all cases, as is true here, the sole question, so far as the evidence is involved, is one as to the credibility of the witnesses, and its solution a function of the trial court or jury to which the questions of fact are submitted for determination. But it may be remarked that there was at least an attempt to explain the alleged contradictions. It is further to be observed that both Desperati and Marchetti are foreigners, and neither was able to speak the English language clearly and distinctly, as we are justified in judging from the manner in which they expressed themselves. In truth, Marchetti, who was not present at the trial, but whose deposition was read thereat, gave his testimony through an interpreter. Desperati explained the several transactions connected with the controversy here in "broken English." We cannot tell, of course, what impression the several witnesses made upon the trial judge by their manner of testifying, except by the result of the trial of the issues of fact as evidenced by the decision. But it can readily be apprehended how witnesses who are not sufficiently familiar with our language to express their thoughts therein clearly, distinctly, and aptly might easily be led into apparent discrepancies in their statement of the facts of the transactions to which their testimony is addressed, and at the same time give their version of the vital facts of such transactions in a manner to persuade the conviction that, in the main, they have told the truth. It is to be admitted that both Desperati and Marchetti seem to have become confused respecting certain dates of the series of events constituting the transactions from which the claimed indebtedness arose, and there was some testimony from which, unexplained, the inference would seem to be justified that the extent of Desperati's indebtedness to Marchetti did not at any time exceed the sum of $1,200, and that of that amount the sum of $700 was paid to Marchetti at the time the lands described in the complaint were sold to Pierini and Dami by Paolini and Leverone, as trustees. These matters Desperati in his own way attempted to explain consistently with the claim that the amount of his indebtedness to Marchetti was the sum for the payment of which he transferred the notes and mortgages to the latter, and his explanation thereof seems to have been satisfactory to the trial judge. We see no such inherent weakness or fault in said explanation as to justify us in holding that, in accepting it, the trial judge made a mistake; nor can we say, as before stated, even if the explanation was not as satisfactory as might be desired, the testimony of the witnesses generally was so affected by the apparent discrepancies referred to as to render it inherently improbable or insufficient, as a matter of law, to sustain the findings vital to the support of the judgment.

[2] 2. The attorney for the plaintiff asked the witness Paolini the following question:

"Didn't Marchetti tell you at that time [referring to the occasion on which the lands were sold to Pierini and Dami] that he had to have all his money?"

Objection to said question by counsel for the defendants upon the ground that it was leading and suggestive in form was sustained by the court, and the ruling is here assigned as erroneous and prejudicial. The ruling turned out to be harmless, for the identical question was propounded in a different and proper form, and, while the answer thereto, as well as answers to other questions seeking like information, were not very satisfactory, the witness appearing to have no memory upon the subject, they disclosed that therefrom the witness very clearly understood what counsel desired to get from him through the question a reply to which was disallowed under the ruling complained of.

[3] 3. The court, upon objection by counsel for the defendants, in effect ruled against the effort of the plaintiff's attorney to secure a statement from Paolini that a certain letter written and addressed to Paolini, and which had been lost or destroyed before the trial, contained language showing that Desperati still claimed to be the owner of the notes and mortgages after the alleged settlement with Marchetti had been effected, and he (Desperati) had directed Paolini and Leverone to transfer to Marchetti said notes and mortgages in extinguishment of the indebtedness ascertained by said settlement to be due Marchetti. The ground of the objection was that the witness had previously been exhaustively examined relative to the contents of the letter, and that it was thus disclosed that he had no definite recollection of the contents of the letter. The court remarked that it would be idle further to question the witness concerning the subject-matter of the letter, since he had already been fully examined with respect thereto and found to be unable to recall the contents of the letter, "unless," added the court, "you can refresh his memory." The inquiry was not further pressed, the attorney for the plaintiff merely replying to the court's remarks: "We will take a ruling." The record shows that previously to the ruling complained of the attorney for the plaintiff had subjected Paolini to an extended examination in an effort to procure from him a statement of the contents of the letter, but without avail; the witness declaring that he had little recollection of the particular matters referred to in the letter. We think that, under the circumstances, the question whether further inquiry into the subject-matter of the letter should be permitted was one resting in the discretion of the court, and we cannot say that, in foreclosing such further inquiry, the court abused its discretion. There must be a limit somewhere to the examination of a witness upon a particular subject, and where, as seems to have been true here, it is evident to the trial court, after a full and exhaustive examination of the witness upon the subject concerning which particular information is desired and desirable, that nothing more can be accomplished by continuing the inquiry than has already been accomplished, then it is clearly within the discretion, and, indeed, the duty, of the court to put an end to the further prosecution of the examination.

[4] 4. The court did not err in disallowing the witness Kirkner to testify to what Paolini told him that the letter mentioned above contained; the object of the testimony being to show that Paolini had said to the witness that in the letter Desperati made a statement showing that he then claimed ownership of the notes. The ultimate purpose sought to be achieved by this testimony was doubtless to contradict the testimony of Desperati that the notes and mortgages had been transferred to Marchetti before the letter was written, but it was manifestly incompetent for that purpose, for it was hearsay, pure and simple. The letter was written in the Italian language, and was not read by Kirkner himself. And the fact that Paolini might have been the agent of Desperati at the time of the receipt of the letter (and it is not clear that he was) would not make the testimony any the less hearsay, for its obvious purpose was to impeach Desperati, and the question here does not present a case where it was attempted to prove that the agent himself, assuming Paolini to have been Desperati's agent then, had previously made declarations concerning the ownership of the notes at variance with testimony given by him at the trial, but it is a case of trying to prove that the agent had told a third party of a statement previously made by his principal which was inconsistent with the testimony given by said principal at the trial. The testimony of a witness cannot be impeached in that way.

[5] 5. The next assignment involves the complaint that the court erred to the prejudice of the plaintiff in refusing him leave to amend his complaint so that it would conform to certain facts developed by the evidence relative to the time at which the assignment of the notes and mortgages was made to Marchetti. The notes and mortgages, as has been shown, were executed in the names of Paolini and Leverone, and an assignment thereof executed by the latter and placed with the bank in which the notes and mortgages had been deposited, with instructions to said bank to deliver the same to Desperati in the event that the judgment in the criminal action against him was reversed on appeal. This assignment was executed in September, 1910; the day not being named. The proof disclosed that the transfer to Marchetti was made on the same assignment on October 3, 1910. The claim is that the court should have permitted the plaintiff so to amend his complaint as that it would therein appear, as the evidence disclosed to be the fact, that, in the place of making an assignment directly to Marchetti, the original one to Desperati had been changed so that, by a notation on the margin thereof, it was made to run to Marchetti. We cannot perceive wherein the plaintiff suffered injury by the refusal to allow the proposed amendment. The theory and the sole ultimate issue in this case is that the transaction culminating in the transfer of the title to the notes to Marchetti was fraudulent and carried out with the intent to defraud the creditors of Desperati. Under this theory, notwithstanding that the complaint avers, and all the pleadings of the defendants admit, that the purported transfer was made on the 3d day of October, 1910, the plaintiff was at liberty, in the proof of the charge of fraud, to present any fact or circumstance in connection with the transaction which might prove or which would tend to prove said transfer to have been conceived and executed in fraud and with the dishonest intention of preventing the plaintiff, as a creditor of Desperati, from enforcing or satisfying his claim against that defendant. It was, therefore, eminently proper, under the averments of fraud as contained in the complaint, that the plaintiff should have been permitted to show the circumstances under which the transfer of the notes and mortgages was made to Marchetti, when it was made, if at all in reality, and when the settlement leading to the transfer was had, or to show by any circumstances available to him the bad faith or mala fides of the transaction, if such was its character. And this is precisely what the court allowed the plaintiff to make the attempt to do. In other words, the plaintiff was properly given, under the rulings of the court, the full benefit of the proof to which his proposed amendment would have been in strict or specific conformity, and the proposed amendment, if allowed, could have added no strength to his case, and was, consequently, wholly unnecessary.

[6] 6. Before the court rendered its decision the attorney for the plaintiff made formal application for the reopening of the case, basing the motion on an affidavit in which he set forth that he was taken by surprise by the proof that the assignment of the notes and mortgages was originally made to Desperati in September, 1910; that the plaintiff had no knowledge of that fact up to the time of the introduction of the proof showing it; that, if given an opportunity, he would be able to show (stating it in a general way) that the testimony of Leverone and Desperati as to the time a settlement was made and a balance struck between the latter and Marchetti was not true; that, when the assignment was made, in September, 1910, the instructions were to make it to Desperati himself, and not to Marchetti; that, if given an opportunity, he could prove that the testimony of Desperati that he was indebted to Marchetti in a greater sum than $1,240 was false, etc. The court denied said motion, and the ruling is assigned as error.

Preliminarily, however, objection is made that the ruling cannot be reviewed because it is not properly authenticated. The proceeding on the motion is in the bill of exceptions which was settled and approved by the trial judge, and appears therein as a part of the proceedings of the trial. The motion having been made before the cause was decided, we think it should be held to be a proceeding arising as a part and during the course of the trial. Besides, the order overruling the motion is not appealable, and rule 39 of this court, requiring the authentication of certain orders when appeals are taken therefrom, applies exclusively to those orders which are appealable.

[7] But there is no merit in the point urged against the order overruling the motion. Whether the cause should be reopened for the taking of further testimony upon the showing made by the plaintiff was a matter wholly within the discretion of the trial court, and we cannot say that that discretion was not wisely and soundly exercised in the action of the court denying the motion.

[8] 7. We can see no merit in the next point discussed by counsel and which involves the contention that the finding that, at the time of the seizure and sale of the notes and mortgages by the sheriff under the execution issued on the plaintiff's judgment, the latter had acquired no right, title, or interest in or to said notes, etc., as against said Marchetti, cannot stand because the court failed to find or decide what claim or interest, if any, Leverone and Paolini had thereto or therein. The complaint explained that the notes and mortgages were to be delivered to Leverone and Paolini only in the event that the criminal case against Desperati was decided adversely to him on appeal, and further stated that the purpose of that arrangement was, not at any time to vest title to the notes and mortgages in those parties, but to indemnify them against loss in case Desperati failed to respond to the requirements of his bail bond, upon which Leverone and Paolini were sureties. The answers of the defendants and the cross-complaint of Marchetti admitted the truth of those allegations, and it was therefore unnecessary to make a specific finding as to the interest Leverone and Paolini had in the notes and mortgages, even if such a finding were in any event necessary, so far as the plaintiff was concerned.

[9] And the transaction involving the notes and mortgages between Desperati on the one hand and Leverone and Paolini on the other did not constitute an escrow, as the plaintiff contends. No conditional title was vested in them. They merely held a lien in the nature of a mortgage on the securities. Section 1057, Civ. Code; 11 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) p. 333; Commercial Bank v. Pritchard, 126 Cal. 600, 604, 59 Pac. 130.

[10] 8. It is further contended that the conclusions of law are inconsistent; the specific point in this regard being that the finding above referred to is, in fact, a conclusion of law, and that it is in conflict with the conclusion of law No. 1, whereby the court concludes, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff never at any time acquired any interest in or title to the notes or mortgages, except such as he might have acquired by purchasing the same under the execution sale to satisfy his judgment. But, as seen, the court found that Marchetti, at the time of the levy of the execution, was the owner and entitled to the possession of the notes and mortgages, and conclusion of law No. 2 declares that the levy of the execution, on the securities to satisfy the plaintiff's judgment was wrongful, inasmuch as the property, when attached or levied upon under the execution, belonged to Marchetti. Thus it is very clear that there is no conflict between the finding (or conclusion of law, if it may strictly be so regarded) referred to and the conclusions of law mentioned.

[11] In any event, if the conclusions of law may be said to be conflicting, assuming the finding mentioned to be a conclusion of law, the other findings support the judgment, and the settled rule is that, where this is true, inconsistencies between certain conclusions of law are immaterial, and cannot operate to vitiate the judgment. *Spencer v. SCHMIDT et al. v. UNION OIL CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 1368.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 10, 1915. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 8, 1915.)

1. EXPLOSIVES ⇐9—OIL—QUALITY AS CAUSE OF EXPLOSION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries caused by an explosion of oil in an incubator lamp, evidence held sufficient to support finding of jury that the explosion and injury were due to the inferior quality of the oil, and not to plaintiff's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⇐9.]

2. EXPLOSIVES ⇐9—TRIAL ⇐248—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO EVIDENCE.

In an action against the seller of oil for injuries received when an incubator lamp exploded, an instruction that courts will take judicial notice of the qualities of such things as artificial gas, kerosene, gunpowder, dynamite, and the like was properly refused as being abstract on the issue whether the oil furnished by defendant was of inferior quality, unsafe for the use to which it was put, and as tending to mislead the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. ⇐9; Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 582, 583; Dec. Dig. ⇐248.]

3. EVIDENCE ⇐7—JUDICIAL NOTICE—QUALITIES OF EXPLOSIVES.

A court will probably take judicial notice of the qualities of such things as artificial gas, kerosene, gunpowder, and dynamite.

4. TRIAL ⇐121—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—COMMENT ON EVIDENCE.

In an action against the seller of oil for injuries to plaintiff from the explosion of an incubator lamp, where the defendant introduced in evidence a report as to the testing and inspection of its oil, signed by an inspector and a tester, and with the initials of a special agent, but failed to supplement such report by the testimony of the parties who made it, the argument of plaintiff's attorney stating that there must have been something very peculiar about the oil, or else the defendant would have had witnesses in court to prove what its test as to explosiveness was, and that the report, admitted over objection, was of no value as not supported by any testimony in court, was not improper, since the significance of the report would have been greatly emphasized if supplemented by the testimony of those who made it, and counsel for the plaintiff was entitled to comment on the invalidating circumstance that such parties were not called as witnesses.

5. TRIAL § 121—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—COMMENT ON ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by C. H. Schmidt and Lizzie Schmidt against the Union Oil Company of California. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 168 Cal. 617, 143 Pac. 776.

W. A. Sutherland, of Fresno, and Thos. O. Toland, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, Joel H. Smith, of Selma, and Geo. Cosgrave, of Fresno, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. Plaintiffs are husband and wife, and the judgment was in their favor for $12,500 as damages for injuries sustained by Lizzie Schmidt in an explosion of oil purchased from defendant. The appeal is from the judgment under the alternative method. Code Civ. Proc. § 953c.

It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiffs were engaged in the poultry business, and, in the prosecution of said business, used incubators for the purpose of hatching eggs by artificial heat; that, to generate such heat, they burned kerosene oil which they bought from defendant; that the use of said oil of ordinary quality for such purpose is entirely safe, and attended with no danger of explosion; "that prior to about March 15, 1911, they had purchased oil of this character from defendant which was entirely safe; that defendant at all times knew the use to which the oil purchased from it by plaintiffs was put; that on or about March 15, 1911, they purchased a quantity of kerosene oil for their incubator lamps believing it to be of the same quality as that theretofore sold them by defendant, but defendant, disregarding its duty in that behalf, negligently and carelessly sold them oil of a highly dangerous and explosive character; that on March 29, 1911, while plaintiff Lizzie Schmidt was using a part of the oil so purchased from defendant in the incubator lamps in the ordinary and customary manner, and without any fault or negligence on the part of plaintiffs, the oil ignited and exploded and shattered the lamp, and seriously burned plaintiff Lizzie Schmidt, to the damage of plaintiffs in the sum of $25,000."

A second cause of action was afterward added by consent, containing the additional allegation:

"That all of the oil sold by defendant to plaintiffs as herein described was manufactured by said defendant."

This was for the purpose, so it is stated by respondents, of showing a statutory warranty.

[1] Mrs. Schmidt testified that in March 1911, they were running 14 incubators, and her particular business in the matter was caring for the lamps. She "was attending to the wicks, and keeping them perfectly clean, and seeing that they were in good shape and in perfect order when they were attended to," and she gave each lamp a thorough cleaning once a day; that prior to the month of March the oil they had been getting from the Union Oil Company gave good satisfaction, but later "it burned badly for one thing, and smoked more or less, and didn't give good satisfaction in a general way; it would not burn bright or clear;" the oil was delivered at the house from the company's tank wagon; that she complained to the driver of the wagon "about the quality of the oil, or, that is, that it was not giving good satisfaction at the time we were using it"; that on the 29th of March, in the afternoon, she started to clean the lamps. As she stooped down and "unhooked the little hooks that carried the lamp and brought it, as I should, to set it down, it exploded with a great force in my face, and had a report like a gun, went off immediately with a great splash in my face, and, of course, naturally caught me on fire all over my shoulders, my dress, and my hair." She had not opened it, and did nothing whatever to the lamp except to take it off the hook. At the time of the explosion she was holding the lamp with both hands in front of her, "going to put it on top of the incubator." After the explosion she rushed from the building all ablaze, and she and her husband extinguished the flames. It is not disputed that she was frightfully injured and disfigured, nor is it claimed that the amount awarded is disproportionate to the degree of severity of her injuries. In fact, it is apparent from the record that the full amount claimed would be no more than just recompense if defendant was liable at all, and as, in the closing brief, appellant recedes from the position taken in its opening, that the verdict was excessive, we need not dwell upon the shocking features of the injury.

The oil, as it was received from the defendant's tank wagon, was placed in a large 60-gallon tank close to where the incubators were kept, and from this she drew it in a gallon can from which she filled the lamps. She testified further that, in cleaning the lamps, "I would always look at it to see that the wick was perfectly clear from any char here; it was always trimmed and always cleaned off," and she had a little brush and always carried a cloth to see that the lamp was perfectly clean, and she had a pair of little scissors to trim the wick, and she always kept the lamp "absolutely clean. It was just like almost a new lamp; of course, it would not look as bright and clean as that, but it would be in perfect order."

Mr. Schmidt corroborated his wife as far as his knowledge extended. He called attention to one additional circumstance, that the oil tank from which they received the oil had several compartments, one of which contained coal oil and another gasoline, and that the faucet to each compartment was similar to all the others. These faucets were at the back of the wagon, six or eight inches apart. Once Mr. Schmidt had asked the driver if he ever made a mistake on account of the faucets being alike, and the latter said: "Well, I did make a mistake at one time, but I corrected it myself before any trouble happened." The driver also told him that the compartments were not the same size, and they used them interchangeably for the different products, oil and gasoline, as their business required. As to the technical test of the quality of the oil, Mr. Schmidt testified that, on the 5th of April, following the explosion, he drew about a quart of the oil from the 60-gallon tank and sent it to F. E. Twining, a chemist in Fresno; that no oil had been put into the tank between the time of the accident and the taking of the sample; and that there was no way for anything to get into this tank unless it came from the wagon.

It appeared that oil was delivered to plaintiffs on the 6th, 13th, 20th, and 29th of March, and it was stipulated that defendant had made two shipments of oil "from its refinery at Oleum to the substation at Reedley, one in January, and the other one arriving in Reedley on the 16th of March, and that it was from this oil delivery sent down to Reedley and arriving on the 16th of March that the oil in question and burning in the lamps on the 28th and 29th of March, 1911, was taken, and that which was delivered also on the 29th was from the same oil as delivered on the 16th of March, from the same car."

F. E. Twining qualified as a chemist, and he testified that he made a flash test of the oil that he received from Mr. Schmidt. He found the flash test was 88°. The flash test is indicative of the amount of volatile vapor, that is, inflammable vapors, in the oil. The lower the flash test the more dangerous is the oil. The flash test is the temperature at which oil will give off vapor enough to ignite. The flash test of oil regarded as safe is 110°. The witness did not consider it a safe oil. The apparatus by which he determined the flash point was what he calls an Elliott tester, but he claimed that it belongs to the class known as open testers. The closed tester, it may be said, shows the flash point at about 20 degrees lower than does the open tester. He also ascertained this point by the Tagliabue method, which is the method recognized on the Pacific Coast, and found it to correspond substantially with the other, placing it at 88°. He also made a chemical analysis of the oil by distillation, and found that it contained 2.98 per cent. of the naphtha group, which would account for the low flash test, and for that reason he did not consider it a safe oil for use in an incubator.

W. A. Smith was employed by plaintiffs, and was on the premises at the time of the accident. He went into the basement immediately after the explosion and picked the lamp off the floor six or eight feet from where the accident happened. The bottom of the lamp was lying on top of the incubator. The burner was lying off in a different direction from the lamp.

W. C. McFarlane, an expert poultry raiser, and who was familiar with the use of incubators, testified that he had been agent for the Jubilee incubators for 18 years (the one in question being a Jubilee incubator), and that they were what are known as the sun hinge burners and were the best made—as good as could be produced. On cross-examination he was shown the lamp that exploded and asked if it looked as though an explosion had blown the burner out of the collar, and he gave it as his opinion that the burner had been blown off.

We think it cannot be doubted that the foregoing justifies a rational inference that the explosion and consequent injury to Mrs. Schmidt were due to the inferior quality of the oil, and not to any want of ordinary care on her part. The evidence would seem to be ample to support the finding of the jury in that respect. However, we may notice a little more in detail the criticism of that evidence by appellant and devote some attention to what are claimed to be errors in the trial of the cause.

Appellant questions the veracity of Mrs. Schmidt as follows:

"If the lamp, hanging in under the incubator, only about two feet from the ground, exploded the moment she touched it or started to take it out, how did the flames catch her, in the face and breast and on her shoulders and back, and on no other part of the body or lower limbs? If she was down in under the incubator when the explosion occurred, so that the flames could have reached her in that manner, then how did the incubator come to be burned on top and not on the bottom or lower part of the sides or ends? And how did the lamp's bottom get on top of the incubator?"

To this it is proper to reply that her testimony as a whole must be considered, and she cannot be judged by a single detached sentence. It is true that she answered, "Yes, sir," to the question, "And it exploded the moment you unhooked it?" but she explained further by stating what we have already quoted to the effect that she had brought it to the top of the incubator and was about to set it down when it exploded.

But, aside from this, it would hardly be fair to require any witness, under the same circumstances, to detail with strict accuracy such a startling, unexpected, and disastrous occurrence. It is quite likely that she did better than most persons could if subjected to the same trying experience. Whatever criticism may be made of isolated statements of the witness, it is entirely clear that her completed story is not improbable, and an appellate court cannot say that the jury were not authorized to accord full credence to her testimony. Believing, as the jury undoubtedly did, that she was trying to tell the truth, they could reach no other conclusion than that the explosion was not due to her carelessness or want of attention to the lamps.

Appellant, probably, has more confidence in the point that the evidence is not sufficient to support respondents' theory as to the quality of the oil. Herein, though, we may say, with proper respect for the able counsel for appellant, that they seem to mistake the function of this court for that of the jury or the trial judge. Much of the argument as to this point, we think, could with greater propriety have been addressed to these other tribunals. We do not see how it can be said that there was no substantial showing that said oil was of inferior quality and dangerous.

Appellant declares:

"The oil that was in the lamp which exploded was delivered March 20th. There was another delivery of oil in said tank on the 29th day of March, which filled the tank to the amount of 60 gallons. Plaintiffs continued to use the oil from this tank for several days after the 29th of March, or until it was about all used up."

Attention is further called to the fact that the sample was taken from the tank "7 days after the last delivery of oil from the Union Oil Company and 16 days after the delivery of the oil which was in the lamp at the time of the explosion, which, according to plaintiffs' testimony of the amount of oil used daily, would show but very little, if any, of the oil delivered on March 20th and that mixed with the oil delivered on March 29th." These suggestions seem to be made to create the impression that the proof fails at the point of identity of the oil analyzed and tested with that in the lamp at the time of the explosion or of similarity in quality between the two. This apparent weakness, however, is removed by the stipulation to which we have already referred. Of course, the oil sent to Mr. Twining was not the same oil as was in the lamp when the unfortunate accident occurred, for a very obvious reason, but, according to the stipulation, the two quantities were taken "from the same oil." It was therefore at least a fair, if not necessary, inference that they were alike. Manifestly, no proof of the certainty of mathematical demonstration could be made of the quality of the oil which exploded, but the evidence furnished by plaintiffs seems to have been legitimate, plausible, and persuasive.

It is also claimed by appellant that the proper inference from Mr. Twining's testimony is that the oil in question was good commercial oil. Part of his testimony is quoted, and it is insisted that from this the conclusion follows that his experiment was made in a closed cup, and "that his result of 88 is equivalent to from 108 to 113 degrees made by the uniform Pacific Coast test, the open cup test, which shows that the oil complained of was not oil of a highly dangerous, volatile, inflammable, and explosive nature and character, but was good commercial oil of the ordinary grade, of the ordinary flash test as understood by the manufacturers and dealers along the Pacific Coast."

Here again, though, as we conceive it, appellant has failed to give proper consideration to the entire testimony of the witness. We need not quote extensively from it, but he entered elaborately and apparently with learning into an explanation of the different scientific methods of ascertaining said quality, and he did say:

"Well, the Elliott test is test as I have it, is not a closed test."

And, furthermore, the record shows:

"The Court: Did you start in with the Elliott test or open test, or the one in the open test?
A. The Elliott; it is practically the open cup."

But it also appears that he made a test with the Tagliabue outfit, which is admittedly an open test, and as to that he declared that the result was just .6 of a degree lower than that obtained by the other, or so-called Elliott test. In addition, as we have already seen, he ascertained the character of the oil by distillation, which is asserted by respondents to be "the only accurate method." We need not dwell further upon this phase of the case. Certainly, the just inferences from the testimony of Mr. Twining are all in favor of respondents' position.

Appellant also directs attention to certain circumstances—for instance, the lack of sufficient ventilation in the basement where the incubators were operated—as evidence that the explosion was due to another cause than the quality of the oil, but their probative force was obviously for the jury, and we think we are not called upon to consider them further.

There is quite a number of assignments of error, but most of them we view as entirely destitute of merit. The following examples may be selected, possessing probably as much merit as the other specifications:

[2, 3] There was surely no error in refusing this instruction:

"Courts will take judicial notice of the qualities of such things as artificial gas, kerosene, gunpowder and dynamite and the like."

It is probably true that the court would take judicial notice of the general quality or character of these substances, but that was of no concern to the jury in the present case.

The question here was whether the oil was of inferior quality, below the ordinary standard, and therefore unsafe for the use to which it was put, and that obviously was a consideration for the determination of the jury. Of course, no one would contend that such question should have been withdrawn from the jury, and the instruction, if abstractly correct in a general way, could not have aided the jury in deciding the issues submitted to them, but, on the contrary, if given, it would likely have confused and misled them.

[4, 5] Appellant took exception to the following portion of the closing argument of respondents to the jury:

"In the first place, I believe that, if there hadn't been something very peculiar about that oil, they would have had witnesses in here to prove what the flash test point was. Now, what have they introduced on that point? They have introduced this paper here, signed by somebody that signed his name as inspector, and by somebody else who signs his name as tester, and the initials of somebody, a special agent. Now, this was done in 1911, 4th of March. The judge admitted this over our objections simply for what it was worth. Now, you remember, gentlemen of the jury, that the men who signed this, there is no evidence that they ever made this test. You don't know but what they just signed this up without looking into it. You don't know how careless they were. You don't know what tests they made, or anything of that kind. This was put in here, and they, for some reason, are not here. We couldn't bring them here. We couldn't tell who was the tester. We didn't know that this report was going to be asked to be introduced. I have no doubt that these men, at least two of them, are still in the employ of this company. We must assume that. Why didn't they have them here, so that we could cross-question them?"

We think the foregoing is within the legitimate range of argument. Our attention is not called to any portion of the transcript that discredits any statement of fact in said argument, and, of course, we must assume that the learned counsel for respondents was acting in good faith with no desire to make an unwarranted appeal to the passion or prejudice of the jury. The said tester's and inspector's report which was admitted in evidence purported to be signed as follows:

"Union Oil Co. of Cal., Reedley, Cal. C. H. Stamm, Inspector; J. P. Blowski, Tester; R. H. H., Special Agent."

It would not have been proper for respondents to criticize, before the jury, the action of the trial court in admitting said document in evidence over their objection, nor can they complain of it here, since they are not appealing. But it is quite plain, we think, that the significance of the report would have been greatly emphasized and enhanced if it had been supplemented by the testimony of the parties who made it, and we can see no reason for precluding comment upon the circumstance that said parties were not called as witnesses.

We have made a careful examination of the record and briefs, and, while not noticing here specifically all the points made by appellant, we are persuaded that there is ample evidence to support the verdict, and that no prejudicial error was committed in the court below. Indeed, we may say that the record discloses the utmost care on the part of the trial judge to secure a fair and impartial trial, and we cannot say that appellant has any just cause for complaint at the result.

The judgment is affirmed.
